Two questionable penalties that were assessed against K-State in last Saturday's game were two 15-yard personal foul calls against offensive lineman Alesana Alesana. The first occurred during K-State's first offensive drive of the game.

The second was during K-State's second to last possession of the first quarter.

"I wasn't pleased," Prince said. "Those penalties, from an overall standpoint, I felt were very disruptive to our overall momentum and the things we were trying to do. The explanation I was given was because he had a closed fist. He had his hand closed and that is what made it a foul."

"That is the explanation I got from the officials. I thought that was a critical moment in the game."

WOMEN'S GOLF

Team at 2nd place in invitational

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's golf team fought tough conditions Monday, but prevailed for a second-place standing through two rounds at the Bronco Fall Invitational at Falcon Crest Golf Course in Kuna, Idaho.

K-State trailed Nebraska after shooting scores of 311 and 310.

The high scores were a reflection of the high wind gusts of 30 to 40 miles per hour.

"Today was a really challenging day just with a lot of strong gusty winds, so it was hard," the Wildcats' coach Kristi Knight said.

"The greens are quite elevated; a lot of them sit on little hillsides, so with the strong winds today, it was a challenge."

The Wildcats faced their toughest tests on the greens, where opportunities to finish holes under par were scarce because of the conditions.

"Where we lost shots was on the green, and that's something that everyone has to deal with, and that is something we have to do better with," Knight said. "It was one of those days where there weren't a lot of tremendous birdie opportunities, and those days can wear on you."

Senior Michelle Regan led the Wildcats with a morning low score of 76 and followed with a score of 75 in round two.

MEN'S GOLF

Wildcats holding 10th in 1st out-of-state meet

By Mike Devader
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State men's golf team traveled out of state for the first time this year to play in the Wolf Pack Classic on Monday in Reno, Nev.

The Wildcats and 18 other teams began competition early in the morning in what might be the most competitive tournament of the young season.

After round one, the Wildcats stood in 10th place.

They posted a score of 5-over par, falling behind the likes of Colorado State, New Mexico State, Iowa State and Arizona.

Arizona leads the field by posting a score of 7-under par.

Finishing out the top three were Iowa State and San Diego, who shot 6- and 4-under, respectively.

With the diverse and strong field in the tournament, the Wildcats fought to stay within striking distance.

In individual action, sophomore Mitchell Gregson had the best first round of all the Wildcats by finishing in 10th, shooting a 2-under par 70 in his first action of the day.

Sophomore Joe Ida had the next best round by posting a 1-over 73. Ida currently sits in a tie for 29th.

Robert Streb, the junior from Edmond, Okla., finished his first round tied for 50th, after firing a 3-over 75.

The second round began Monday afternoon, but because of time-zone differences, scores were not available at press time.

Cheap eats

Tubby's Sports Bar offers 50-cent tacos every Wednesday night.

Aggieville bars provide inexpensive, tasty foods

Bars are infamous for an easy — and sometimes cheap — way to have a good time. In many cases, the bar food itself can be worth the trip.

Bar food might have a reputation for being questionable and greasy — good enough only to satisfy post-libations cravings. However, many bars, especially in Aggieville, are using specials to change the stereotype.

Three bars with food specials were chosen at random, and their food was evaluated. The criteria were taste, quantity and quickness of service.

MEGAN MOLITOR

TUBBY'S

The first visit was to Tubby's for its 50-cent taco special. Every Wednesday, customers can enjoy all-you-can-eat-tacos. In this visit, it was four. After a wait that was a touch too long for tacos — nearly 20 minutes — it was quickly apparent the wait was worth it.

The four tacos could barely be squeezed in the plastic bowl they came in. They could be ordered in hard or soft shells and were oozing with seasoned meat, diced vegetables and cheese, and were ready to be drenched in salsa. The only down side was sour cream was an extra quarter, but when your tacos are only 50 cents, one can usually afford it.

THE PURPLE PIG

The next stop on the quest for great bar food was 30-cent wings at the Purple Pig. They can be ordered just about any way you like them, with about any dipping sauce. For this experiment, the chosen combination was barbecue — drenched in ranch.

The only down side is that despite all the advertisements for wings, there was not a single wing on the plate — just legs. However, they were still meaty and easily will leave faces speckled with sauce.

The wings were not quite as filling as Tubby's tacos, but out of 15 ordered, three were left on the plate, and the whole meal was only $4.50.

RUSTY'S LAST CHANCE SALOON

The final choice for bar food is perhaps borderline cheating. Rusty's Last Chance Saloon offers a $2.99 hamburger and fries special with the purchase of a beverage. The only catch is, the customer must present a coupon for it. The coupon came out of the "College Coupons" booklet that was handed out left and right at the beginning of the semester.

This special is definitely the most filling of them all. It is as American as it gets: a greasy burger and salty fries, with all the fixings.

The "with purchase of a beverage" clause isn't much of a downer — one is needed to wash down all this food. The food was out extremely fast — in about five minutes.

Rusty's did not skimp on the portions either. It was definitely as much food as one would expect to receive at any other restaurant for at least double the price.

This is only the tip of the bar food iceberg. The specials listed here were all excellent in their own delicious way, but many others exist. The best way to find them is to get out there, bring along $5 and see how much food you can get with it.

Other bar specials can be found in Collegian advertisements, or at www.wildcatmenus.com. Happy eating.

With "College Coupons," a burger and fries cost about $3 at Rusty's Last Chance Saloon.

Another Farrelly film fails

"The Heartbreak Kid"

Movie review by Brendan Praeger

The Farrelly brothers used to be the kings of R-rated comedies.

The first four films they directed, "Dumb and Dumber," "Kingpin," "There's Something About Mary" and "Me, Myself, and Irene" were all comedy classics.

Lately, however, their films have been considerably less appealing.

"Shallow Hal" and "Stuck on You" would have barely worked as short skits during the last half of a "Saturday Night Live" episode, let alone full theatrical films. Even "Fever Pitch," an adaptation of Nick Hornby's brilliant soccer memoir, couldn't cash in on a Red Sox World Series victory to make an entertaining film.

"The Heartbreak Kid," a remake of the 1972 romantic comedy of the same name, looked like a shot at redemption for the Farrelly brothers. Unfortunately, the result is their worst film yet.

Ben Stiller is Eddie Cantrow, a middle-aged man on the track to perpetual bachelorhood. He meets and hastily marries a seemingly perfect woman (Malin Akerman) only to find out on the honeymoon that she is completely crazy. While contemplating his quickly failing marriage, he falls in love with another woman (Michelle Monaghan).

It's all pretty standard territory for romantic comedies, but a comedy doesn't necessarily have to be brilliant to succeed. "Superbad" was by no means a narrative masterpiece. I would be willing to ignore the plot's shortcomings if the film was funny, but sadly, it doesn't get the job done.

I've never considered myself a huge Ben Stiller fan, and this movie just confirms my opinion. He is great at playing over-the-top characters in films like "Dodgeball" and "Heavyweights," but his sensitive, unlucky-in-love character has been stretched far beyond its limits. By the end of the film, his character is more detestable than relatable, ruining any good will the audience has left.

Akerman does a great job as the crazy wife, and though she's a total psycho, her character is sympathetic enough not to deserve the heartbreak of losing her new husband before the end of their honeymoon.

While Stiller's performance is less than entertaining, the supporting male roles are the film's best feature. Rob Corddry is hilarious as a friend in complete denial of his own miserable marriage, and Jerry Stiller steals the show as Doc, Eddie's perverted father.

The film isn't a complete loss. It features one of the funniest sex scenes ever, as well as a great climactic scene with a jellyfish, a mariachi band and a hideous merkin (a female public wig). Sure, there are laughs, but not nearly enough.

Like the failing marriages in "The Heartbreak Kid," the Farrelly brothers' career has taken a turn for the worst. It's time we all started seeing someone else.

2 students involved in wreck

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE UNIVERSITY

A K-State student was transported to Mercy Regional Health Center Monday afternoon after being struck on a motorcycle at the corner of Sunset Avenue and Claflin Road, according to police reports.

Ben Gordon, freshman in architecture, was driving eastbound on Claflin on a 2004 Honda motorcycle when a 2005 Chevrolet Cavalier, driven by Bo Eckman, senior in accounting, collided with the vehicle, Riley County Police Department Lt. Kurt Moldrup said.

Gordon was treated for cuts and abrasions to his face, arms, legs and feet, according to the report.

Moldrup said Eckman was headed west on Claflin when he turned left in front of Gordon onto Sunset and struck the motorcycle.

Police said a citation was issued to Eckman for failure to yield.

NCAA investigates football program

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State football program is under investigation for potential rules violations between a former female university employee and current and former K-State football players, the K-State Athletics Department announced Tuesday.

Athletic Director Tim Weiser said Tuesday the investigation focuses on issues of academic misconduct and extra player benefits, but is not likely to result in the forfeiture of games.

Weiser said the university is cooperating fully with the NCAA's investigation.

Weiser said the university was provided with information about the possible rules violations in March. Soon after the report, Weiser said the university began an investigation.

"At that point, we decided to look further into what information we obtained and how valid that was," Weiser said. "As we went down that road, it became obvious to us that there were some issues that we needed to alert both the NCAA and university to."

Though no coaches were linked to the investigation, Weiser said a former university employee, three former players and two current players are under investigation.

"To this point there is no evidence that any member of the coaching staff, support staff or representatives of our athletics interests are involved," Weiser said.

Weiser said the university is confident that the former university employee intentionally violated NCAA rules.

"We are further confident that those extend to a violation of university rules and regulations and beyond that," Weiser said. "I think we will know more in the coming weeks and months."

Weiser said the university informs all people involved with the athletic department about university and NCAA rules.

"This was not a case of somebody not knowing what the rules were and what the Homelessness an increasing problem in Manhattan

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Inside the old, diminishing house on the corner of Leavenworth and North Eighth streets, more than 20 temporarily homeless people live in an area usually accustomed to holding not much more than six people, while many more homeless wait for a bed to open.

Homelessness is a growing problem in Manhattan, and current facilities might not be able to handle the increased need for financial and housing assistance, said Mandy Chapman Semple, director of the emergency shelter.

The Manhattan Emergency Shelter Inc., one of the only housing establishments available for homeless people in Manhattan, has turned away more than 200 people since January 2007.

"The need for more beds to house these people is very evident," Chapman Semple said. "In the past couple of years, we have been completely full."

After 27 years of housing local homeless, the emergency shelter will move to a new location at Fourth and Yuma streets. Chapman Semple said the new house, which will not be completed until sometime next year, will hold up to 47 people - more than twice as much as the current location.

Even with the new building under construction, Chapman Semple said the demand by the homeless for financial assistance is higher than ever in Manhattan. She said there are more than 500 reports of homeless cases a year in Manhattan, and that number is growing.

"There's a lot more poverty and low-income here than most people think," she said. "The poverty level for Riley County is more than 40 percent."

Chapman Semple said the number of homeless reports is lower than the actual number of homeless because many stay with family members or other people in the community. She said rural homeless people are not stereotypical homeless people who sleep on the side of the street and ask for money.

"Rural homelessness looks a lot different than urban homelessness," she said.

The shelter, on the corner of Leavenworth and North 8th streets, provides a shelter to more than 20 temporarily homeless people in a house with only five bedrooms. After 27 years of housing local homeless, the emergency shelter will move to a new location at Fourth and Yuma streets.

Chapman Semple said the people who come to the shelter become homeless for several different reasons. Some are drug and alcohol abusers, some are crime victims and others have some type of disability.

She also said more than one-third of the people at the shelter are families. She said they live in the emergency shelter for several months before the parents are able to find jobs. Almost half the people who use the shelter are single males who usually stay at the emergency shelter close to six weeks. Chapman Semple said single males now are staying eight to 10 weeks because they can't find jobs in the area.

"They can't find a decent place to live," she said. "Things are expensive now."

The emergency shelter is not the only place helping homeless people that has noticed an increase in need for financial assistance.

Fire department stresses extinguisher knowledge

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

Using a fire hydrant to put out a controlled fire simulator, Austyn Ames, freshman in hotel and restaurant management, is supervised by Steve Doughty, fire inspector with the Manhattan Fire Department. The fire department set up booths in Bosco Student Plaza from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m., and will be there again today as a part of Fire Prevention Week.

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A four-letter acronym and about 15 seconds are critical in extinguishing small fires.

In observance of Fire Prevention Week, the Manhattan Fire Department simulated a fire with propane gas and taught students how to extinguish fires with the acronym "PASS" on Tuesday at Bosco Student Plaza. The activities also will take place from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. today.

Steve Doughty, Manhattan Fire Department fire inspector, said there are four steps in using an extinguisher. First, pull the extinguisher's pin. Aim the nozzle at the fire's base while standing about 8-10 feet from the fire, Doughty said. Then squeeze the handles together to open up the extinguisher.

Lastly, sweep the extinguisher's nozzle from side to side across the fire's base, he said.

Prior to utilizing a fire extinguisher, Doughty said it is important to sound a fire alarm and notify other building occupants that a fire exists so they have adequate time to leave the building.

Extinguishers only contain enough agent to last about 15 seconds, Doughty said. It is important extinguisher users close the door behind them when extinguishing a fire, and it always is best to extinguish a fire as close to an exit as possible, he said.

"If you close the door, that could give you as much as 30 minutes before the fire puts itself out or just burns down the room," Doughty said.

Manhattan Fire Department code requires all residences with three units or more to have a fire extinguisher in each apartment unit or at least one extinguisher on each building level, Doughty said. The fire department also requires all residential buildings with three or more units to have a residential sprinkler system, he said.

"We encourage them in a lot of other places, too, like furnace rooms," Doughty said.

Fire extinguishers are available for purchase at lumber yards, hardware and retail stores. They cost between $40 and $60, and Doughty said he recommends all residents have one in their living spaces.

"I even recommend people carry them in their cars," he said. "A small fire can be put out quickly and save a lot of money."

Actor Nick Nolte and his girlfriend Clytie Lane had their first child together — a baby girl — on Thursday. The 66-year-old has been dating Lane for several years, and they announced her pregnancy in March.

Nolte's daughter weighed in at 7 pounds and 13 ounces. This is the first child for Lane, who is somewhere in her 30s, and the second for Nolte, who has a 21-year-old son from a previous marriage.

The actor is working on the new Ben Stiller comedy "Tropic Thunder."

TECH FAN CREATES VICK'EM SHIRTS

Those who will attend Texas A&M's football game Saturday in Lubbock might see an unwelcome sight.

Two Texas Tech students are selling controversial T-shirts bearing the image of A&M's mascot, Reveille.

The T-shirt, red with black text and images, displays the words "Vick'em" across the chest. The back bears the image of a football player wearing a number 7, dangling a dog labeled "Reveille" by a rope.

The "Vick'em" and the football player are meant to portray Michael Vick, the professional football player who was convicted in August of running a multi-state dog-fighting ring.

Geoffrey Candia, the shirt's creator and a student at Texas Tech, said he wanted to sell the shirt through his fraternity, but the university turned down the group's request to sell the shirts on campus.

"I'm a business student, and I saw the profitability and went ahead and printed the shirts," he said.

Candia said the shirt does not mean to advocate animal cruelty. It is simply for fun.

"The original idea, when it was still through a student organization, was to give 50 percent of our profit to the Animal Defense League here in Lubbock, simply because we knew there would be a controversy about the shirts, you know, animal rights, stuff like that," he said.

COORS, MILLER COMBINE

MILWAUKEE

Miller Brewing Co. and Coors Brewing Co., the nation's second- and third-largest brewers, are combining their operations, creating a bigger challenger to Anheuser-Busch Cos. — but also raising the possibility of future job cuts.

For now, long-time Coors executive Leo Kiely will run the newly merged operations of Miller Brewing and Coors Brewing. But Miller President Tom Long is Kiely's heir apparent, and Miller owner SABMiller Plc will pick MillerCoors' chief when Kiely retires — perhaps within a few years.

Those facts emerged from Tuesday morning's Webcast presentation to analysts about the agreement to combine Miller and Coors.

A decision hasn't been made yet on where the MillerCoors headquarters will be located once the merger is completed in 2008. None of Miller's six breweries, or the two breweries operated by Coors, will close as a result of the merger, said Pete Marino, Miller spokesman.

But administrative jobs in Milwaukee and at the Coors offices in Golden, Colo., will be analyzed as the merged company looks to reduce costs, he said.

"It's safe to assume there will be some reductions," Marino said, adding that it's too early to estimate the extent of those job cuts and where they will occur. MillerCoors will maintain a presence in both Milwaukee and Golden, Marino said.

Miller has 1,700 employees in Milwaukee, with 800 employees in the corporate offices and 900 brewery workers.

P.R.A.I.J.N. meeting discusses Christians' responsibility of leadership

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

God calls upon humans as the salt of the earth in measuring their potential as Christians, a minister and recent K-State graduate said Tuesday night.

Paul C. Robinson Jr., a 2006 graduate in construction science management, spoke to about 50 people about human potential within Christianity in reference to Matthew 5:13 passage during a P.R.A.I.J.N. Christian fellowship dinner Tuesday night at the K-State Alumni Center.

"It's not the circumstance you are in that's the measure of your true potential - it's the spirit that dwells in us," he said.

Robinson said he has visited many houses with people of different financial and racial backgrounds, but he always has found salt in their kitchens. Likewise, humans are the earth's salt and are found everywhere.

"Being the children of God, it should be up to us to make the gift of God available to everyone," he said. "We've got to give our potential a responsibility."

Robinson said humans have the necessary tools it takes to live up to their highest potential because God's spirit dwells within them.

"God will never call you anything but 'you,' but the real question is 'Who are you?'" he said. "Many people cannot answer that."

Defeat occurs when people do not live the life God intended for them and live up to their full potential, Robinson said. People often stay comfortable in their ways because they are afraid to move forward with their faith, he said.

"We are not yet where we are supposed to be, but a lot of us are satisfied with where we are," he said. "We're losing our saltiness, and we're wasting time."

Founded at K-State in spring 1999, P.R.A.I.J.N. is a spiritual organization that serves as an outlet for all students, especially multicultural students, faculty and staff members. P.R.A.I.J.N. stands for Praising Righteousness Always in Jesus' Name.

Bishop Clarence R. Williams Jr. also spoke about leadership during the dinner. Williams, a Junction City-based bishop, said people must understand what it means to serve as a follower before defining a leader. Everyone is a leader based upon the individual gifts and talents God granted them, Williams said.

He also said while many definitions of leadership exist, it is defined in the spiritual context as "moving people to God's agenda."

"When God calls people to lead, he has a purpose, and that purpose is to fulfill his agenda," Williams said. "We make every effort to move people from their own agenda to God's will."

TO THE POINT

Prevention week is not a joke

This week is Fire Prevention Week, and with this comes the responsibility to learn to do your part in reducing the risk of fire-related accidents.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

While most students probably just ignore the message of this week, there is an important message that can be learned: don't be stupid.

Often, college students do dumb things — like start fires. So instead of blowing off events taking place this week, it might be worthwhile to stop by and see what's going on. For those of you who Doogie Howser'd your way to K-State or just slept through elementary school, you can learn some tricks to help make sure you don't catch your friends on fire or burn down your house.

Instead of just focusing on the stop, drop and roll technique, practice a home escape plan with your roommates. Just like the National Fire Prevention Association's Web site says, fires never go on holiday, so you should always be ready. If you need more incentive to practice, the NFPA is encouraging people to submit videos of themselves running through their drill to YouTube.com. Who could turn down that opportunity?

Most houses, apartments, dorms and greek houses are required to have fire extinguishers. Instead of just familiarizing yourself with the location of it, you also should know how to use it.

Don't look at Fire Prevention Week as a joke, or something just for little kids. Now that you're on your own, you'll have to be responsible if a fire breaks out.

Keep that in mind next time you leave your cheesy pita warming up in a toaster oven unattended.

Holy Obama

Candidate mixing politics with religious beliefs

Candidates for president have been feeding off religious groups for many years, but Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., needs to stay out of churches and get back on his campaign bus.

Obama has been sporting his Christian faith by attending both predominantly white and predominantly black churches along the campaign trail to sway voters of different religions and ethnicities.

On Sept. 8, Obama turned into a guest preacher at a mega church in Greenville, S.C. According to CNN, "Redemption World Outreach Center describes itself as 'a Spirit-filled Church, characterized by dynamic worship, supernatural miracles, and relevant ministry for all ages ... reaching people from all walks of life.'" By speaking at this particular church, Obama has the potential to convince the 10,000 member congregation to vote for him.

This isn't the first time Obama has done this; in a town-hall meeting in Aiken, S.C., Obama quoted the New Testament. Beliefnet.com, which contains its "God-O-Meter," a measure of "God Talk" in political campaigns, puts Obama on top of all democratic candidates. It is time for Obama to stop using faith and ethnicity as a method to get more votes.

Obama's excuses are evident in his North Carolina campaign, "40 Days of Faith and Family," which organizes Bible study programs, gospel concerts and a series of faith forums. According to a media release by Obama's campaign, it is "an opportunity for people of faith to come together, across racial and denominational lines, to talk about how they live their faith outside of the four walls of the church, what they want to see from their presidential candidates, and how Obama's faith informs how he thinks about the issues of our time."

Obama feels this is the best way to reach at least 50 percent of Democrats in North Carolina.

Keeping church separate from the state was written about by our founding fathers. James Madison once wrote in a journal excerpt, "There is not a shadow of right in the general government to intermeddle with religion."

Separation of church and state is guaranteed to citizens through the First Amendment. Even today, people are touchy about having "In God we Trust" on our currency or "Under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance. Obama oversteps his political boundaries by speaking, attending or even quoting Scripture during speeches to gain popularity in the polls.

Because many people think religion is important, it might be a good campaign strategy for Obama to visit such mega churches and connect with his fellow Christians. However, it is not a good representation of ethics and morals, and it crosses the line that should be drawn between church and state.

Citizens should vote for candidates because of their stances on issues. Though religion can reflect these stances, just because Mitt Romney is a Mormon or Obama is a Christian does not mean citizens should vote for them.

If Obama wants to gain the vote of a much greater group of people, maybe he should stick to the "Good Person" motto. Obama should be showing citizens he is a good person who makes good decisions in the best interest of everyone.

Citizens should want presidents who are going to be honest, trustworthy and loyal to the position they hold.

If Obama wants to be commander in chief, he should start by separating his political life from his religious one.

GUEST COLUMN

Supreme Court Justice's book gives glimpse at man's character

It would be hard to think of anyone whose portrayal in the media differs more radically from the reality than that of Justice Clarence Thomas. His recent appearances on "60 Minutes," the Rush Limbaugh program, and other media outlets provide the general public with their first in-depth look at the real Clarence Thomas.

These media appearances are part of the promotion of his riveting new memoir, titled "My Grandfather's Son." Otherwise, Thomas would probably have continued to confine himself to doing his work at the Supreme Court, without worrying about what was being said about him.

In an era when too many judges, including justices of the Supreme Court, seem to be playing to the media gallery — if not writing opinions or leaking information with an eye toward favorable coverage in the press — Justice Thomas' refusal to play that game tells us a lot about him.

His memoir tells us more. Born in material poverty beyond anything experienced even by people on welfare today, Thomas was raised with an abundance of discipline and character-building that would pay off later in life.

This was largely the work of his grandfather, who raised him and whom he now calls "the greatest man I have ever known." But that was not his view at the time, when he was a child.

His grandfather, however, was not preoccupied — like so many modern parents — with how the children see things. He used his role as a parent to see things that children could not see, including challenges that they would encounter in later life.

The metamorphosis of Clarence Thomas went through many phases — from altar boy to seminary student to a campus radical and racial militant, before eventually coming full circle back to the values his grandfather taught him and an understanding of the law and society that he acquired on his own.

One sign of where he was in his radical, militant phase was that, when someone gave him a book of mine to read, he threw it in the trash basket.

But, by the time I first met him in 1978, he had already reached the same conclusions on his own that I had reached.

Those conclusions were probably more firmly grasped because they were his own, rather than something he read by someone else.

Thomas' own experiences shocked him into a realization that affirmative action and other policies being pushed by civil rights organizations and by liberals generally were doing more harm than good, both to blacks and to American society.

In an era when so many people have neither the time nor the patience to examine arguments and evidence, critics have tried to dismiss Thomas as someone who "sold out" in order to advance himself.

In reality, he was in far worse financial condition than if he had taken the opposite positions on political issues.

As late as the time of his nomination to the Supreme Court, Thomas' net worth — everything he had accumulated over a lifetime — was less than various civil rights "leaders" make in one year.

Nobody sells out to the lowest bidder.

The other great myth about Justice Thomas is that he is a lonely and embittered man, withdrawn from the world, as a result of the brutal confirmation hearings he went through back in 1991.

Thomas was never a social butterfly. You didn't see his name in the society pages or at media events, either before he got on the High Court or afterward.

In reality, Justice Thomas has been all over the place, giving talks, especially to young people, and inviting some of them to his offices at the Supreme Court.

During summers he drives his own bus all around the country, mixing with people at truck stops, trailer parks and mall parking lots. The fact that he is not out grandstanding for the media does not mean that he is hunkering down in his cellar.

Thomas' sense of humor is terrific. Whenever I am on the phone with someone and laughing repeatedly, my wife usually asks me afterward, "Was that Clarence?" It usually is.

Now, thanks to his book, the public can get to know the man himself, rather than the cardboard image created by the media.

Downtown redevelopment will cause O'Reilly to relocate

By Andy Heintz
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

O'Reilly Auto Parts will change locale because of the downtown redevelopment project.

The store, currently located at 324 Fort Riley Blvd., will move its business Juliette and Fort Riley Boulevard because of the development in the south end of downtown Manhattan. A three-story parking garage will replace the former store.

"The parking garage will be right next to a convention center, which is connected to a hotel," said Mark Hatesohl, Manhattan mayor pro tem.

The auto parts store is one of several stores on the south end of Manhattan that must move to other parts of town because of the development project, Hatesohl said.

"Several businesses have already moved," He said. "The NAPA Auto Parts store moved six to eight months ago to Eighth Street and Fort Riley Boulevard."

Hatesohl said Jason Hilgers, assistant city manager, has been working with Dial Realty, the developers, to help O'Reilly find a new location.

Spencer Lombardo, developer for Dial, said he and Robert Greene, director of real estate and legal services at O'Reilly have been working to find a solution.

Mayor Tom Phillips said the city commission approved the first reading of a rezoning ordinance for O'Reilly to relocate to Fort Riley Boulevard on Oct. 2; however, nothing will be certain until the final ordinance is voted on Oct. 16.

O'Reilly will remain open in its current location until the new store has been built, Lombardo said.

"The same day we will open the doors to the new store, we will close the doors to the old store," Lombardo said. "So they will not lose a day of business."

Greene declined to comment until the process of relocating is finished.

Before O'Reilly can relocate, Lombardo said Dial must close contracts with the current owners of the land where the new store will be. He said some of the vacant land is owned by Gary Duncan, owner of Powell Brothers Inc. Lombardo said Duncan agreed to let Dial purchase the land in exchange for them rezoning his other land.

Lombardo said Dial also must purchase a two-story rental house owned by Robert Caniff, which is in the same area.

The deals Dial has made with Duncan and Caniff will not be finalized until the city commission approves the rezoning ordinance for the second time, he said.

Etiquette necessary at filled rec

You might not know it judging by the weather outside, but it's fall. Though the Kansas weather stubbornly refuses to let go of summer temperatures, one day soon, you'll stumble out of your loft and have to reach for a sweatshirt.

KENDALL HALL

The dynamic has been changing gradually at the Peters Recreation Complex because of the weather, and if you pay attention, you'll see that cardio machines are becoming more scarce, and the cubbies are filling up just a little more every day. Here are some cool weather tips to keep in mind at the rec.

Since everyone and their dog tends to come to the rec to do their cardio workouts when the weather is soggy or just plain cold, some etiquette needs to be followed. First of all, when you are on a machine, leave your gym bag, jacket, monkey or whatever you bring, in a cubby or hang it up on a coat hanger.

This isn't a rule because we want to make it easy for someone to take your stuff. It's a rule because people trip on it or your stuff gets caught in the machines and breaks them — or you. I understand that it's amusing to see someone bite it because they tripped on your stuff, especially if they have significant muscle tone and are strutting, but it's not very nice. Consider it your good deed.

While you're at it, why don't you leave the cell phone too? By bringing it into the building you're just risking losing it. Here's the real truth of the matter though: when you talk on your cell phone and try to work out, you look like an idiot. When you talk on your cell phone on the elliptical, you aren't working at a high enough intensity for the exercise to make much of a difference. You are annoying the heck out of everyone around you. Muscle man on the treadmill next to you doesn't care about how you got drunk and hooked up with that KU fan, and really, do you want everyone to know that?

But the cell abuse doesn't stop there. Some people try to use their cell phones and lift weights. While using your phone on the cardio machines is annoying, using it in the weight room is just rude. The rec rules kindly suggest that you remove yourself from the weight machines between sets. If you are talking on a cell phone and sitting on your machine, however, your eight sets could turn into a half-hour monopoly on a machine that three other people are waiting to use.

I'm not telling you to leave your expensive phone in your expensive gym bag in a cubby for anyone to steal, right? Not quite. The best way to prevent something from getting stolen is to not bring it.

If you have a gym bag, you can put it in one of the larger lockers by the vending machines in the rec. If you are a regular rec rat, you can rent a locker in the locker-room downstairs. If all you need is a place to put your keys and student ID, then one of the small lockers on the weight room desk would be perfect for you. However, weight-room attendants are not there to watch your stuff to make sure it doesn't get stolen, so don't ask.

Most people, believe it or not, turn in items they find, even iPods. I'm not telling you to test the integrity of your fellow exercisers, but you can have a little faith.

These are just tips to make your rec experience a little more pleasant this fall and winter. When the weather turns cold, and people pack onto machines like sardines, you will be glad when the person next to you puts their phone away after saying, "Hey, I'm at the rec. I'll call you back later."

During high school, Kelsey Chipman quit playing basketball to focus on volleyball after receiving a scholarship offer to play volleyball at K-State.

Middle blocker plays with dad's, family's support

By Jonathan Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

During the spring semester of her junior year of high school, Kelsey Chipman accepted a scholarship offer to play volleyball at K-State. Afterward, she decided to forego playing her senior season of basketball at Washburn Rural High School to focus on volleyball.

Many thought her father, Bob Chipman, would be disappointed when his daughter quit playing a sport he loved so much. After all, he is a former K-State basketball player and is the men's basketball coach at Washburn University.

However, he said he is just glad to see his daughter involved in a collegiate sport.

"She was very good at basketball, but she just loved to play volleyball," coach Chipman said. "I feel like this is all a bonus. I've got a beautiful young lady that is intelligent and athletic too."

Originally from Flint, Mich., coach Chipman played basketball for two years at Flint Community Junior College before becoming a Wildcat. He played for former K-State coach Jack Hartman for two seasons from 1971-73.

"Coach Hartman had coached some pros, and I was still thinking that I was a pro," coach Chipman said. "He did it his way. At the time, it was pretty frustrating, but after it was all over, you figured out that he taught us how to grow up and how to win."

As Kelsey grew up, her father taught her some of the lessons he learned from Hartman about competition and success.

While in high school, she led her volleyball team to its first 6A state championship in school history.

Kelsey continues to compete today, but now plays for the 16th-ranked K-State volleyball team. She is a sophomore middle blocker and leads the Wildcats this season with 89 block assists.

Though her father is a coach, Kelsey said he is focused on leaving the volleyball instruction to coach Suzie Fritz.

"Both my parents are just huge support systems for me, and they are not negative towards me at all," Kelsey said. "My dad tries to make it to every game because when the season starts he gets really busy."

Coach Chipman already has attended several K-State volleyball matches this season, but said he will have to miss a few because of his team's basketball practices.

"On Oct. 15, I have to pass the baton to my wife, Carol," coach Chipman said.

Among Division II men's basketball coaches, coach Chipman is ranked ninth all-time in wins with 620. Despite his professional success, he said his family always comes before anything else.

"She needs me to be her dad," he said. "After she plays, I just give her a hug and always tell her a few things that are really positive. I always look forward to the next time."

Arizona dominates at tourney; Wildcats grab 9th place

The K-State men's golf team entered the final day of the Wolf Pack Classic with a legitimate chance to challenge for the win.

The only problem was Arizona, the tournament leader, made sure no one took the lead. Arizona ran away with the tournament win, while the Wildcats slipped to ninth.

"The final round wasn't anywhere near our best," coach Tim Norris said. "We didn't put it all together, and there is a fine line between being competitive and sealing the deal."

Arizona finished with a commanding 16-stroke lead over second-place Iowa State. Rounding out the top five were San Diego, New Mexico State and Utah.

In individual play, sophomore Mitchell Gregson led K-State. Gregson finished in a tie for 22nd with a score of 2-over par.

Freshman Kyle Smell posted the next-best Wildcat score with 3-over par. He finished in a tie for 27th.

"Mitchell is always a solid player," Norris said. "For Smell to do the things he does as a true freshman is impressive."

Robert Streb shot 5-over, while Joe Ida ended with a score of 7-over. The players finished in ties for 34th and 42nd, respectively.

Norris said his team needs to play a complete round to be successful.

"We can't play 16 or 17 holes, we have to play well on all 18," Norris said. "Tournaments are a chance to go out and overachieve, and we haven't done that yet this year."

Norris said his team still needs to improve in some areas.

"We need some rounds under par every now and then," Norris said.

"We have to eliminate the double and triple bogeys," Norris said. "Those really take the wind out of the sails, but if we eliminate the big numbers we can get to the next level. We just need to play to our potential."

The Wildcats are off until they participate in the Club Glove Intercollegiate in Somis, Calif., Oct. 22-23.

NCAA | Weiser: University is confident about investigation expectations were," he said. "That was very clear and very evident. This was an intentional and deliberate act to violate university policies and NCAA regulations."

Though the university declined to release the names of the players under investigation, The Topeka Capital-Journal reported that former players Ro Grigsby, Antonio Brown and Alphonso Moran were investigated.

According to the Capital-Journal, Grigsby and Moran were forced to show papers written under the guidance of a former university English tutor.

Weiser said both current players under investigation are practicing, but only one is competing.

Weiser said he would not reveal the extent of possible NCAA punishment for the violations until a later date.

"I certainly don't consider that a very good scenario for us to be in the middle of an NCAA investigation," he said. "Until they finish their investigation, and we have a chance to sit down and share notes and compare our findings with their findings, I don't think it's probably safe for us to predict what the worst-case scenario might be."

However, Weiser said the university is much more confident about the issues under investigation.

"That's not to say that we are relieved or relaxed, but I think that our fans should know that our philosophy remains unchanged about our commitment to playing by the rules," Weiser said. "We are not going to ever participate with somebody that we don't think is eligible to compete or practice. We are certainly are not going to employ, or have people involved in our program, that we know, or have reason to believe, would intentionally violate NCAA rules."

Women's team earns 2nd despite heavy winds

K-State fought heavy winds for the second-consecutive day Tuesday at the Bronco Fall Invitational at Falcon Crest Golf Course in Kuna, Idaho.

Despite the weather, the Wildcats held on to take second place to Nebraska, shooting 336. Senior Michelle Regan tied with Nebraska's Allison Stewart for first place as each took a share of the title.

Wind speeds increased throughout the tournament, reaching 40 to 50 mph Tuesday. K-State coach Kristi Knight said it was the windiest conditions she ever had coached in.

"In our practice round we played into completely different wind," said Knight. "Wind is something you can't control. You hit what you think is a good shot, and if the wind gusts or dies down it can be frustrating."

Regan and Kali Quick led the team with scores of 82 in the third round of the tournament. Quick and teammate Abbi Sunner tied for fifth.

Knight said she was happy with the second-place finish, given the weather conditions.

"The girls played hard," Knight said. "I just think there were a couple places where they got frustrated at the conditions and not being able to control what was going on with the greens."

Tae Kwon Do academy opens off-campus facility

Elaine Morgan, junior in marketing and assistant instructor, demonstrates a routine for the class Thursday evening at Sun Yi's Academy located above Pizza Shuttle.

Members of Sun Yi's Academy of Tae Kwon Do have moved off campus.

The group, which formerly met in Ahearn Field House, now meets in the suite just above Subs 'n' Such on the corner of Denison Avenue and Claflin Road.

David Moore, master of the academy, said a perk of having a facility off campus is it will attract a broader audience, though he said it is not the goal of the new location. He said the idea is to produce better quality students, rather than quantity.

"We'll have more options, less interference with the university and most significant of all is that we'll be able to have class more often and set our own hours," Moore said.

The group used to meet for class twice a week on Tuesday and Thursday nights. Now they assemble five days a week, said Elaine Morgan, assistant instructor of the academy and junior in marketing.

"At Ahearn we'd get kicked off the floor for track meets, but now we have a place of our own, and it's great," said group member Brian Cooper, senior in mechanical engineering.

It was not just a matter of moving from one place to another. Cooper said a lot of work went into getting the place ready. One wall was torn down, another was built, and a locker room was built by group members.

"Everybody contributed something," Morgan said. "It was all volunteer work."

Morgan said she hopes to see more participants from Fort Riley come now that there are more frequent meeting times.

Moore said self improvement is the group's overall goal.

"Joining this group is one of the best decisions I have ever made in my life," said assistant instructor Daniel Buller, group member of four-and-a-half years. "I was looking for something to identify with, and I was looking for discipline, and I was the only one in my class that stuck it out. That's a good feeling."

Tae kwon do gives each person a different experience, Moore said.

"Everybody's going to look at it and get something different," Moore said. "Most people take tae kwon do for the self defense, but some are here for the confidence, discipline, physical conditioning, muscle toning and the list just goes on and on."

The group meets Monday through Thursday from 7 to 8 p.m., and on Saturdays from 10:30 to 11:30 a.m. at 1800 Claflin Ave., suite 202.

Identity theft prevalent in Manhattan, among college students

By Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dustin Blackburn returned from Aggieville to his residence Sept. 21 and noticed his wallet was missing.

According to Riley County Police Department reports, Blackburn, Manhattan resident, had his mother's and his credit cards in the missing wallet.

Janet Blackburn, Dustin's mother, said an acquaintance called her and said someone was using her card and signing her name at Fast Eddy's, a pool hall in Aggieville. Janet notified police officers, and they met her at the pool hall, Schoen said. When the officers entered the hall, they found John William Clark Jr., 48, who had used Janet's credit card at various locations throughout Manhattan.

"My privacy was taken, and to know they could have gotten away with a lot more than they did scared me," Janet said. "I never thought this would happen to me, and once it has you are afraid to let your card out of your hand."

Det. Steven Gregoire said a total of $125 in goods and services was bought with the stolen credit card. Gregoire said he sees identity theft cases like the Blackburns' two or three times a week.

"A lot of (cases) are dealing with credit cards or credit that has been obtained," Gregoire said. "Recently, we have been dealing with utilities, where a utilities account has been opened with someone else's security number."

Some of the utilities reports have been clerical error, but sometimes it could be a legitimate identity theft, Gregoire said.

Between January and December 2006, the Federal Trade Commission reported 670,000 consumer fraud and identity theft complaints in the United States. In Kansas, 1,626 identity theft cases were reported. The report also states electronic fund transfer-related identity theft continues to be the most frequently reported type of identity theft bank fraud.

One new way hackers are stealing student information is by digging through the trash of residence halls. Gregoire said to protect yourself from this, always shred every document.

Addison Price, junior in business management, said he thinks he is at a low risk level for identity theft because there is a lot of security from his bank.

"I have four ways to sign in, and they ask me multiple questions," Price said. "You use your Wildcat ID instead of your Social Security Number, so you have two numbers for K-State as well."

Price also said the more numbers that represent you as an individual, the harder it is for a hacker to track you down.

K-State issued new identification cards to all students and faculty in fall 2006. The new IDs eliminated the printing of Social Security Numbers on the cards. Now, students are given a Wildcat ID number.

Craig Johnson, manager of the K-State ID Center, said the change occurred as the university looked to improve the ID system.

"New state laws also changed the IDs," Johnson said. "The are some challenges when students have to display their card to a department but the wildcat ID number is being used a little more each day."

He also said it is not very common to hear about stolen IDs, but most students do report when they lose an ID.

At the K-State ID Center, anyone wanting to receive a new university-issued card is required to show another form of identification. Johnson said identity theft is not a problem with student IDs, though.

One company is dedicated to making sure students and others are not the victims of identity theft.

Todd Davis, CEO of LifeLock – an identity theft protection company – said he is sure of his company's security.

He said the fastest growing crime in the United States for seven years has been identity theft.

Davis said students need to be aware of identity theft and assume it can happen, but his company tries to protect its customers.

"We are a dramatically different company because we try to prevent the crime before it happens," Davis said. "Our company has a $1 million guarantee that our system will work."

Davis said LifeLock prevents crimes by placing a credit score on all credit cards. If an individual steals a credit card and tries to get another credit card, LifeLock will call the cell phone of the card holder for verification.

TIPS TO AVOID IDENTITY THEFT

1. Shred everything – even important documents.
2. Do not state personal information on checks. Only put first initial and last name on checks. If an address is needed on the checks, put a work address.
3. Reduce the amount of credit cards carried in a purse or wallet, especially in Aggieville.
4. Take pin numbers off the back of credit or debit cards.
5. Check credit history religiously, and always report a suspicion immediately.

– Riley County detective,
Steven Gregoire

BLOW-BY-BLOW

BATTLE IN 'THE HILLS'

Viewers debate about TV stars' redeeming, condemning qualities

Many have written her off completely, but Heidi Montag from the oh-so-addictive reality TV show "The Hills" is much more than she seems.

APRIL NEWBY

Recently, Heidi has come under fire for her backstabbing moves and lame friend skills, but Lauren "LC" Conrad, Laguna Beach native and reality TV pro, can be nearly as nasty.

Heidi and Lauren were the best of friends until Spencer — Heidi's current fiancé — entered their lives nearly two years ago. Heidi fell head-over-heels in love, and all Lauren could do was criticize.

Granted, Spencer was a creep and any good girlfriend would have and should have said something, but Lauren took it too far.

She became entirely too wrapped up in Heidi's love life and couldn't let go. Everyone criticized Heidi for distancing herself from Lauren, but in reality, Lauren didn't help matters by driving her away.

Let's not forget Lauren's ultimate freak-out moment last season when Heidi announced she was moving in with Spencer. Lauren claimed they could never be friends again. However, just a year before, when Lauren moved in with Jason, Heidi raised no objections. She was visibly supportive of her best friend and merely stated she would miss Lauren as a roommate.

Lauren is up to her old tricks again this season as well, but this time, she turns her attention to Audrina and the infamous "Justin-Bobby." Claiming to have learned her lesson with Heidi, she attempts to stay out of Audrina's love life, but can't contain herself completely. In a recent episode this, Audrina stormed out of a hotel room in tears because of Lauren's criticism. That's not so nice, Lauren.

Of course the central Heidi criticisms revolve around the decisions she makes in her love life.

Lauren is just as bad — if not worse. The former "love of her life," Jason, has been in and out of rehab and jail, with a history of assault and substance abuse. After getting out of rehab and being newly-engaged, this season of "The Hills" sees him just as unstable as he was in the past. Why, Lauren, why?

Many could say Heidi's lack of friends should be a clear warning flag that she has alienated everyone (except, of course, Spencer) because of her recent behavior. While she clearly has fewer friends than Lauren, it is only because everyone is on "Team Lauren" right now. Hollywood is all about being with the right people at the right time, and right now Lauren is the right person to be with. Also she's technically the star of the show, so it's popular to be Lauren's friend.

While Lauren is technically the star of the show, let's face it — Heidi is the reason people tune in each week. She might have less reality TV experience, but she became a breakout star almost immediately. She has graced the pages of more magazines than Lauren, and Heidi just provides more entertainment. Lauren is a boring pity-party who, most of the time, laments lost friendships and failed romantic relationships.

Professionally, both Heidi and Lauren are doing well, but while Lauren got her probably unpaid internship with Teen Vogue because of her past reality TV stardom, Heidi scored her job because of her obvious people skills and vibrant personality. It's admittedly impressive Heidi locked down her current public-relations position at Bolthouse with no previous experience, college degree or even star power at the time she was hired.

After two years at Bolthouse, she has climbed the corporate ladder, while Lauren has held the same position at Teen Vogue the entire time she has lived in Los Angeles.

Heidi has been criticized this season for a backstabbing rise to power at her job after going behind fellow co-worker Elodie's back to request consideration for a promotion. I'm sorry — if Elodie is going to be stupid enough to say something to Heidi about a promotion that both women are equally eligible for, that is her problem. Heidi simply was being competitive in the workplace. And she works hard at her new position. Heidi has stated numerous times this season how she has had to work until 3 in the morning. She even left her anniversary dinner for a work emergency. Heidi takes her career seriously.

Heidi is simply a victim of a scumbag fiancé who has fallen out of favor with viewers. She is part of the show's success equation, however, and the continuous Lauren vs. Heidi throw-down is one of the best parts. While it's a personal decision regarding which camp to support, Heidi provides for great entertainment, regardless.

"The Hills"
Most Entertaining
Socialite

This is the third of many battle pages that will run this semester on The Edge page. While the main point is satirical, the facts are true, and the authors are passionate about their respective topics. Today's battle debates who is the most entertaining socialite on the teen drama "The Hills." If you have a suggestion for a battle topic, e-mail The Edge editor Eric Davis at edge@pub.ksu.edu

Lauren Conrad is easily everyone's favorite character from MTV's "The Hills." From her days on "Laguna Beach" when it was her or the other girl — Kristin — to her current show, "The Hills" — and her battles with Heidi — Lauren easily wins over both these girls.

Why does everyone favor LC over Heidi? The question really is, why not? Look at Heidi's backstabbing ways, not only with Lauren but also with her former co-worker, Elodie. Heidi took Elodie's job promotion right out from under her.

Heidi began the first season with a bang and made it about halfway through the second season with friends. Now the list of people she can call friends is reduced solely to her tool-bag fiancé, Spencer. Even he has no friends left after he broke up with his longtime best friend, Brody. Meanwhile, Lauren still has friends — and plenty of them. Heidi and Spencer are a boring, unsociable couple, and there is not much to watch with a pair like that.

Lauren is simply the truest friend on the show. Yes, she can be a little too concerned with her friends' boyfriends, beginning with Heidi and now with Audrina, her current roommate. Who would not look out for her friends when they are dating tools like Spencer and Justin-Bobby?

Audrina, you can do so much better than Justin-Bobby. Has he ever washed his hair? It's disgusting. If one of my friends were interested in a guy who has sick hair, wore jeans tighter than me and was flat-out strange, I would tell her — and I would want someone to do the same for me.

Also in the fight over who is superior, one needs to take into consideration who has had more airtime. The answer, hands down, is Lauren.

She was one of the main characters on the first two seasons of "Laguna Beach." Where was Heidi during that time? No one knows — probably being teased for being flat-chested and having a weird nose. She made a small appearance here and there, but nothing really worth a lot of talk.

Also, "The Hills" is Lauren's show. MTV created "The Hills" to follow Lauren as a spin-off of "Laguna Beach," and Heidi is nothing but a tagalong who no one likes.

So what does Heidi do best when the attention is not on her? She causes drama to focus attention on her. She does this simply by spreading rumors, like about Lauren and Jason's alleged sex tape and other worthless drama.

Meanwhile, Lauren really could care less about Heidi. She does not provoke any drama and just tries to live her life. She does not cause drama like Heidi does, mainly because she has a life and hasn't driven away her friends. Lauren does not have time to create drama, but Heidi has time because — outside of work — all she does is fix her boyfriend's house décor.

Another aspect to consider when deciding what side to take is overall productivity — meaning school, jobs and career.

Both Lauren and Heidi came to Los Angeles to attend fashion school, which did not quite work out for Heidi. Even at the interviews, Lauren was very professional and made a great impression. In Heidi's interview, she openly discussed her love for partying and dislike for school.

Heidi's partying ways took priority over school, and she quickly dropped out when she got a job at Bolthouse.

In the beginning, the job was not full of the glam Heidi had pictured. However, she eventually was able to work her way up, but not without going behind Elodie's back to get there.

Meanwhile, Lauren, who is still in school, has an internship with a high-profile publication, Teen Vogue. She is jet-setting across the country, and the opportunities presented to her are endless. It is quite obvious that Lauren is a harder worker than Heidi and is more honest in her work.

One easily can see that Lauren should win in the battle against Heidi. She is a better friend, has more friends, is more successful and the star of her show. No one really wants the tagalong friend who is trying to milk her menial fame while she has it. If Heidi was not on the show, she would not be missed — we would no longer have to listen to her or her whiney boyfriend, Spencer.

Lauren's life makes a better show and is more interesting because she actually has a life and does things worth watching.

HOMELESS | Area churches, Housing Authority work to provide support affordable housing with rent, utilities and pharmaceutical expenses. Jan Connizzo, director of the ministry, said they have spent more money and helped out more people than during any previous year.

"We are unable to find shelter for them because there just isn't enough affordable housing in Manhattan," Connizzo said.

Connizzo said Shepherd's Crossing has spent more than $82,000 on 486 different clients from January to August this year. Much of this money comes from the 39 Manhattan area churches and local donors and businesses. She said Shepherd's Crossing does not assist military personnel or traditional college students. She said the ministry does help numerous non-traditional students who have full-time jobs, spouses or children.

The emergency shelter also financially helps people who leave the shelter looking for affordable housing and jobs.

Chapman Semple said nearly 50 percent of people at the shelter have left with jobs this year. She said this is a high percentage because 12 percent of people who came to the shelter already had jobs. She also said more than 25 percent of temporary residents this year have left with or are waiting for financial disability support.

Many of the these people find housing with the Manhattan Housing Authority.

The Manhattan Housing Authority offers more than 250 affordable housing units to the community. JoAnn Sutton, executive director of the MHA, said the units are in high demand. She said people are on a waiting list for up to one year, depending on the type of housing.

Sutton said the people who live in the MHA units have to meet certain financial requirements and can stay in the units for as long as they meet those requirements. She said MHA also does a background check on the possible tenants.

"The biggest issue for them is getting reliable resources, and some fail background checks," Sutton said. "There are times we can work around those issues, though."

The city commission, which establishes funding for the emergency shelter, also has noticed the increase in area homelessness.

"Certainly it has caught our attention, and that's why we've been funding the emergency shelter," said commissioner Jim Sherow.

Sherow said the issue should be addressed by the commission later this year.

Later this month, Manhattan will be host to the Kansas Statewide Homeless Coalition Housing and Homeless Summit, an annual meeting to discuss and improve statewide treatment of homeless people.

Chapman Semple said the summit, which unites state homeless people and homeless agencies, takes an approach to provide information for anyone in attendance. A variety of experts from across the state will speak during the two-day summit on numerous topics.

Chapman Semple said this is the first time the summit, which takes place Oct. 23-24, has been in Manhattan. She said the growing homeless problem in Manhattan, as well as the steps Manhattan is taking to alleviate the problem, are reasons the summit is coming to Manhattan.

"Manhattan's just really being recognized as a community that is making strides against homelessness," she said.

During several apartment inspections across Manhattan, Doughty said he has seen stove tops covered in grease that posed fire hazards.

Maintaining a clean living residence and taking out the trash on a regular basis are several tips Doughty said he offers college students in fire prevention.

"Just some simple cleaning can make a world of difference," he said.

The university's Division of Public Safety, Manhattan Fire Department, State Fire Marshall's Office, Kansas Forest Service and Pi Kappa Alpha all provided activities for K-State Fire Prevention Week.

If students speak with Pike members about fire safety information, they can enter a free raffle drawing for a DVD player. Ross Schaffer, Pike community service chair, said the fraternity started the raffle last year with firefighters and received a strong turnout.

"It's the second time we've done it, and we hope to make it a long tradition," said Schaffer, sophomore in secondary education.

Pike members started the raffle and information booth because a fire truck is one of the fraternity's many symbols, Schaffer said. Through his personal observations, Schaffer said most college students are unaware of fire precautions.

"A lot of things I've seen in peoples' houses aren't very safe," he said. "Little things like electrical cords under rugs are potential hazards."

Karie Noll, sophomore in business, said she participated in the fire-extinguisher demonstration because she had never used one before and thought it would be a fun learning experience.

While she does not personally own a fire extinguisher, Noll said her current property manager placed one in her house.

"You never know what could happen," Noll said about college students and fire safety. "It's good to be safe."

Kyle Leonardelli, sophomore in business management, also said he had never used a fire extinguisher prior to Tuesday.

"College students are dumb and start a lot of fires, and they need to know how to put them out," Leonardelli said. "I learned a valuable lesson — aim at the face of the fire."

Wildcats to fight hunger

By Mayra Rivarola
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Wildcat fans have the chance to help feed area families for the coming holiday season at the K-State vs. University of Colorado game Saturday.

The Cats for Cans campaign is an event organized by the Flint Hills Breadbasket in Manhattan. It is a community food network that gathers and distributes food to low-income families for more than 20 years, according to the breadbasket's Web site, breadbasket.manhattanks.org.

The Leadership Concepts class and K-State student athletes support the campaign.

"Student athletes will go around the parking lot collecting donations from fans to support the Flint Hills Breadbasket," said Brett Scott, president of the student-athlete advisory committee.

Scott, graduate student in business administration, said athletes will accept donations of canned foods or other non-perishable items and cash.

Students also have the option to drop off their contributions at a Cats for Cans booth, which will be located on the east side of the stadium, said Natascha Philip, the Breadbasket's executive director.

Last year the campaign collected 14,155 pounds of food and $7,000 in cash donations, Philip said.

"I am expecting a huge success this year," she said. "The Leadership Studies students have already collected almost double than what they had last year."

Scott said donations so far total 11,000 pounds of food, compared to the 6,500 pounds students gathered last year.

Recent staph outbreak concerns city officials

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A recent staphylococcus outbreak in Manhattan has health officials encouraging students to be aware of open wounds and to practice proper hygiene to prevent the contagious infection.

Carol Kennedy, director of health promotions and nutrition counseling at Lafene Health Center, said most staph infections are spread by contact, and bacteria is everywhere.

Kennedy said symptoms of staph infections are usually sores or boils on the skin where the bacteria enters. She said the bacteria can enter the body through an open wound and then enter the blood stream, which can cause the bacteria to affect a different area of the body.

"Most of the times that staph occurs, there is an association with shared equipment," Kennedy said.

Joe Blubaugh, director of communications for the Kansas Department of Health, said the department suggests people practice good hygiene using soap and hot water, and people with lesions or wounds should keep them covered and dried.

Blubaugh said when staph outbreaks occur, it is essential that the area has an established routine of using bleach solutions on surfaces that come in contact with different people.

'Stop Kiss' a tale of 2 female friends finding identities

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It is a modern-day, urban story based on an emotion that all of humankind relates with — love.

Two women meet as friends during its first scene, and the show "stops" with their first kiss.

"Stop Kiss," a show produced off-Broadway in 1998, opens the Department of Speech Communication, Theater and Dance 2007-08 performance season tonight at Nichols Theatre. The cast features seven cast members, including three freshmen.

Hailey Gillespie, graduate student in theater with a drama-therapy emphasis, portrays Callie. A traffic reporter in New York City, Callie appears in 22 of the play's 23 scenes. She develops a friendship with Sara, a third-grade teacher who moved to the Bronx, N.Y., from St. Louis to teach underprivileged children.

Both women experienced only heterosexual relationships prior to meeting one another. The two experience derogatory language from a man in the park who attacks Sara and leaves her in a coma. Lauren Perez, freshman in theater, portrays Sara.

Director Kate Anderson said the theater department selected "Stop Kiss" because of its diverse subject matter and smaller cast.

"It's a love story, and in this instance, it happens to be between two women who have never had that kind of relationship," said Anderson, associate professor and K-State director of theater. "They've always had relationships with men, and so they're both a little surprised. But in the end, they just can't deny the connection and attraction between them and want to be together."

Reliving the evening of her lover's attack, Callie (Gillespie) talks with her best friend George, played by Dillon Artzer, freshman in theater, about the night that changed her life.

While today is also National Coming Out Day, a day celebrated for awareness among gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender persons, Anderson said "Stop Kiss" opening night corresponding with the day is coincidental.

"It's not that we're trying to be socially relevant all of the time," Anderson said. "Theater is about telling stories about real people, and we try to tell everybody's stories and not just one experience that someone may have."

"Stop Kiss" Playwright Diana Son also serves as a supervising producer for "Law and Order: Criminal Intent" and has written for "The West Wing," "Law and Order" and "Law and Order: Criminal Intent."

Anderson said she appreciates Son's structure within "Stop Kiss" and how the script realistically in-

Workshop relates art to Chicano culture

By Jelani Yancey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students and faculty members discussed the representations of Chicanos in mainstream art Tuesday night as part of Hispanic Heritage Month.

Tanya González, workshop moderator, showed four examples of Chicano art using a digital slideshow. She and an audience of more than 20 people discussed each work's relationship to mainstream U.S. art and identity in the K-State Student Union.

"This workshop showed the importance of having Latina representations become a greater part of what we see in everyday America," said Shireen Roshanravan, assistant professor of women's studies.

González, assistant professor of English, explained the origin of the term Chicano. She said it initially received reference during an activist movement that became popular during the 1960s. A Chicano person is native to the United States but is also associated with the Mexican community within the United States, González said. Chicano quickly became a cultural designation and subsequently was applied to art produced from the culture, she said.

Using the term evokes a history and past of the Mexican-American civil-rights movement.

"It's an identification, but also a cultural signpost," González said.

González first showed the "Chicano Gothic," a parody of Grant Wood's well-known 1930 painting "American Gothic."

Todd Holmberg was chosen after a national search of about 25 candidates for the position as McCain's executive director. Before being hired at K-State, Holmberg was the executive director of the Corpus Christi Symphony Orchestra in Texas.

New McCain executive director aims to involve entire K-State community

By Jelani Yancey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

McCain Auditorium's new executive director plans for community outreach tactics to raise audience attendance and increase private funding.

Todd Holmberg, former executive director of the Corpus Christi Symphony Orchestra in Texas, was selected from a national pool of about 25 candidates to be McCain's director.

"I'm here to help K-State fulfill the mission of expanding knowledge, enriching cultural activities, developing human potential and providing leadership for the excellent staff I inherited," Holmberg said.

Holmberg's main goal is to increase student involvement with McCain.

"I would like to see more students be ticket holders," he said.

He said he would like to implement a dialogue with the student body, giving students the opportunity to influence some of the events.

McCain used to have a student-advocacy group, Holmberg said. It might be possible to reinstitute this group and use it to reach the student body and serve as a forum for feedback from students, as well as give students a larger role in influencing events at McCain.

Holmberg said he also will try to showcase more "world events" and "world music," like the Tango Buenos Aires dance performance that took place Sept. 16 at McCain.

"I'd like to see more cross-cultural programming," he said.

Holmberg said his biggest challenge is to break down perceived barriers students might have regarding the fine arts.

"Once you get them to that first live performance, when they experience the magic, they tend to come back," he said.

The selection committee consisted of music and speech communication, dance and theatre department heads and several deans from the College of Arts and Sciences. Charles Reagan, associate to the president, served as chair of the committee.

"We sought somebody with managerial expertise, business acumen and experience in the performing arts," Reagan said.

After earning a master's degree in trumpet performance from the University of North Texas, he was the principal trumpet at the Texas Chamber Orchestra and the Garland/Las Colinas Symphony Orchestra. He also played for the Richardson Symphony Orchestra, the Plano Chamber Orchestra, the Dallas Chamber Orchestra and the Dallas Wind Symphony.

Holmberg spent four years working at the Van Cliburn Foundation in Fort Worth, Texas. As production manager for Van Cliburn's international piano competition, Holmberg said he learned how to work with the world's greatest artists. Van Cliburn is a U.S. pianist who won the first quadrennial International Tchaikovsky Piano Competition in Moscow at age 23.

Holmberg also has spent his summers as an administrator at the Blue Lake Fine Arts Camp, a program that offers art, dance and theater programs to children each summer in Michigan. In 2000, he became a full-time director for the program. He kept that position until 2005, when he was offered a job with the Corpus Christi Symphony Orchestra, where he served for two years.

CCSO President Debi Miller credited Holmberg with the reconstruction of the staff, the development of new music education programs and the reorganization of CCSO's accounting and finance divisions.

"It made a huge difference in timeliness and access to information," Miller said. "It really helped our board of directors."

Richard Martin served as McCain's executive director for 21 years. Martin retired in January, and McCain associate director Terri Lee served as interim director until Holmberg took office Aug. 13. Department of Music head Gary Mortenson contacted Holmberg when the position became available.

Holmberg said at McCain, he faces many of the same issues he dealt with at CCSO, including the challenges of reaching out deeper into the local community and increasing ticket sales.

"I wouldn't be able to succeed at this position if I had not gained the experience at Corpus Christi," he said.

McCain Auditorium's most popular attraction is the McCain Performance Series, which showcases 12-18 professional artistic events on campus annually. Aimed at giving K-State students the opportunity to experience a wide variety of performance arts, the series includes presentations of string quartets, ballets and operas, said Thom Jackson, McCain marketing and development director.

"We would like to educate the student population about the magic of live performances of all types of genres," Holmberg said.

The director contracts with production companies to secure these performances, Jackson said.

K-State theater productions, Landon Lectures and music department recitals also take place at McCain.

"It really comes down to our director to be able to coordinate and implement all that," Jackson said.

Greensburg citizens gain attention for post-tornado cleanup efforts

By Whitney Hodgins
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

GREENSBURG, Kan. — When an EF5 tornado destroyed 95 percent of Greensburg on May 4, residents were forced to choose between rebuilding their former lives or leaving the disaster site for greener pastures. One-third of the population stayed, determined to rebuild a home for their community.

Five hundred survivors now sit in 'FEMAville' — the term they use to refer to the area dominated by Federal Emergency Management Agency-donated trailers — waiting to see the funding they have been promised, anxious to start rebuilding.

To tell the story of the residents, the Discovery Channel will create a 13-episode TV program about the town and its rebuilding to launch the channel's new Planet Green network next year.

"If you spend 10 minutes here, you'll know they can do it," said supervising producer Johnny Gould. "Life in a FEMA trailer in the dirt isn't ideal, so their resilience is inspiring. The easy thing to do would have been to collect on insurance and leave."

Greensburg was chosen as the setting for the show when its citizens decided to rebuild the town as an environmentally-friendly "green town."

Tiff Winton, producer of the show, said filming already is in progress, but it simply will document the rebuilding process rather than hinder it.

"The last thing we want to do is add to the tragedy," Winton said.

Like most Midwesterners living in tornado alley, Greensburg residents didn't expect a 200-mph tornado when the weather report warned of strong winds that Friday.

"Usually when the storm sirens go off, we don't take it seriously," said Carmen Renfow, administrative assistant for Greensburg's emergency management and long-term recovery committee. "But by the time I moved, a two-by-four went through my TV."

The Renfow family home, built in 1910, was one of 5 percent of structures left standing after the storm.

After the destruction, many of the residents chose not to have idle hands as they dealt with the shock of living through a natural disaster.

Renfow said the proactive attitude of survivors surprised FEMA — one of the first aid groups to arrive after residents were allowed to evaluate the damage — by cleaning up the rubble themselves.

"When FEMA came on their valiant steed, they couldn't figure out how the streets were already cleared," Renfow said. "When I told them the locals and neighboring ranchers had done it themselves, they didn't believe us. I think they were surprised by our attitude."

Ray Stegman, city coordinator and former Greensburg sheriff, was storm-searching when he spotted the tornado, which grew to 1.7 miles wide and travelled for 22 miles, according to the National Weather Service. His 30-minute warning gave residents a chance to run for shelter, saving hundreds of lives.

"I came to town fast to let everyone know," he said. "I remember thinking that I didn't ever want to see another tornado. Then, the day after, there were four more."

Stegman said the Kansas National Guard, Department of Transportation, and Highway Patrol began a search-and-rescue mission, and cleanup operations quickly after the storm. Twelve people died because of the tornado, 10 of which were Greensburg residents — a catastrophic number for the 3-square-mile-town.

By the time President George W. Bush and Kathleen Sebelius declared Greensburg a disaster area, residents were already in local shelters like the hospital and courthouse, temporary mobile-homes donated by FEMA or the homes of family and friends.

"You know everybody here," said Kendal Lothman, assistant coordinator of the emergency committee. "Everybody might not be family and friends, but they came together to help everyone regardless."

"That's how it's always been here. It's not a new concept created by the tornado."

So far, Greensburg's story has gained enough attention to inspire monetary donations and attract big-name publicity, but the financial situation is still an enormous obstacle.

Pam Reves, city treasurer, said too many T-shirts have been sent — and too little palatable funding.

"None of us know where the money goes," she said. "We're not seeing any money except from FEMA donations. And we're appreciative of the T-shirts, but please stop sending them, because we don't have anywhere else to put them all."

Reves said all the money Greensburg receives goes to rebuilding the infrastructure, but the process of obtaining that funding has been hindered greatly by shifting politics.

Reves said United Way set up a Greensburg disaster fund in May, but as of Sept. 27 she hasn't seen a dime. The U.S. Department of Agriculture teamed up with United Way of the Great Plains to create a Community Self-Help Housing Program in September, but she said residents cannot help themselves without funding.

Reves said she estimates the total cost of rebuilding will be close to $40 million.

Jena controversy an example of racism bred into people

Racism always has been at the forefront of issues our nation has faced. This was especially highlighted by the recent incident in Jena, La.

The case made national news and outraged the world. About a year ago, according to MSNBC, a small group of students hung nooses from a large tree after a black freshman asked if he could sit under it. Three months after the original incident, a white student was beaten unconscious. Six black students were charged with attempted murder for the crime, but the charge later was reduced to aggravated second degree battery.

Emotions erupted everywhere after the arrests. Shock and outrage caused passionate responses, no matter which side people took in the incident. Protests and even Facebook.com groups were evidence of that.

As it usually happens in events like these, the celebrity community decided it was its civic duty to get involved. According to an Oct. 6 CNN.com article, rapper Mos Def made a video urging students around the country to walk out of classes on Oct. 1 to support the "Jena Six." John Mellencamp wrote a song that said "Jena, take your nooses down."

Murphy R. McMillin, Jena mayor, was not impressed. He told The Associated Press he thinks Jena has been characterized as a town full of hatred and racism, and complained the Mellencamp song was full of defamatory remarks.

Now the town has the image of being a center of racism, hatred and all things intolerant. When students start hanging nooses from trees, people are going to be suspicious, especially when the town isn't famous for fighting racism.

What is so frustrating is how the mayor of Jena is quick to sweep this incident under the rug. When a handful of young citizens demonstrate a set of morals and behaviors so full of hate, something obviously has gone wrong in this town.

No one was right. It was wrong of the first group to hang the nooses, and it was obviously wrong for the black students to retaliate in the way they did. No matter what one's opinion is, the feelings and emotions run deeper than this group of students.

When McMillin says a line was crossed with Mellencamp's song, he is overlooking something important. These students learned how to respect others — or not — from someone else. It is unlikely someone just woke up and decided to start hating for idiotic reasons.

These acts of racism were bred into these students and racism runs deep in the town of Jena. Unfortunately, the same is true for the rest of our country, not just Louisiana and other states in the South.

An incident like this could happen anywhere. As much as we try to fool ourselves, racism hasn't really gone away. We just stick it in our back pockets to pull out and use when we think no one is looking. It comes in the form of a joke, an annoyed comment, or a remark that just "slips out." It is never limited to any race, or directed at anyone in particular.

The answer, at the end of the day, is tolerance. We've been preaching this in our schools, churches and on soapboxes for years, but it has done little, except to force offenders to hide it better. It is time to act on what we've been taught, to change life dramatically and to take down our nooses, because an incident, like the one in Jena, could happen here too.

Obama's decision stirs media, shows political evolution

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., is speaking his mind, and, in the process, having a controversial week in the media. Obama gave a stirring "leave Iraq" speech four years ago, and has spent this week trying to remind people just how long he's been against the war. However, this isn't what the media has been writing about.

What has he done that the media considers such a big deal this week? He's taken off his lapel pin of the U.S. flag. The senator commented, "I probably haven't worn a flag pin in a very long time. After a while I noticed people wearing a lapel pin and not acting very patriotic." He went on to say that patriotism is more about what's in your heart and less about appearance.

In a political year, this would seem like an amazing chance to stir up a debate on flag appreciation and patriotism. If nothing else, it could be something to argue about and differentiate the candidates. The responses so far are not aggressive. Has the "who is more patriotic debate" finally run its course?

The U.S. flag, and how we honor it, has really been a hot-button issue since the birth of the flag. Issues like flag burning, the proper way to retire the flag and what should be in the Pledge of Allegiance have haunted our political rhetoric for years.

Moreover, how we honor the flag is how politicians have branded one another — patriotic or not. This is what makes Obama's choice interesting and maybe a little stupid.

An article in the Washington Times on Oct. 6 reported former Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, R-Md., said ridicule of Obama is justified.

An Oct. 5 article in the Daily News of New York reported that Rudolph Giuliani (R) issued a statement of no comment. Former Gov. Mitt Romney, R-Mass., said he rarely wears lapel pins in general, but is proud of the flag when he does.

Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., agreed with Obama, saying, while she wears a pin, there are numerous ways a person can support the flag. After a comment like this, if the former lieutenant governor of Maryland is the only one who supports the scrutiny, it becomes obvious the only place this war is being fought is in the media.

It certainly isn't the media's fault — many expected there to be a political backlash. It was expected that extremely liberal Obama would be chastised for his decision, at the least, and that one of the other candidates would take this opportunity to move to the right of Obama on this issue.

It is wonderful to see the evolution in political dialogue. As the New York Times reported on Oct. 8, after Obama's remarks about the Iraq war, Republican candidates have disagreed about the war, and Democratic candidates have altered the details to fit their Iraq strategies.

Coming from a long line of military service families, I have great pride in the flag as a symbol of freedom, but an even greater sense of pride when our representatives wave goodbye to nonsense issues and debate important ones. No matter what a person's political affiliation or personal beliefs might be, those are what spur patriotism.

Holiday emphasizes awareness

Today marks the 20th anniversary of National Coming Out Day.

The day, which started in 1988, originated in celebration of the Second National March on Washington for Lesbian and Gay Rights that took place in 1987.

While the day's name insinuates that Oct. 11 is reserved for just revealing one's sexual orientation, the day also is designed to create dialogue and raise awareness among different sexual orientations. Coming out is a deeply personal process, and people should decide to come out only when personally ready.

Twenty years ago, when AIDS was an emerging disease in the United States, coming out was a life-or-death matter, Mark Shields, Human Rights Campaign Coming Out Project director, said in a press release.

In 1987, ABC News reported that only 11 percent of Americans said they associated with "male homosexuals." More than 70 percent today say they personally know or work with someone who identifies as gay or lesbian, according to the Human Rights Campaign Web site.

"Stop Kiss," a play that features two women who previously identified themselves as heterosexuals falling in love, opens tonight. The play features many themes during its 23 scenes, including love, identity and tolerance. Students and faculty members should attend the show with an open mind and look at love from a perspective other than their own.

Humans often are without control of their emotions because love is such a raw, deep and personal emotion. It is a tricky four-letter word, but love is love — plain and simple.

Aggieville store offers students Birkenstock shoes, repair services

By Jenna Scavuzzo
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Olson's Shoe Service, a quaint store in Aggieville that specializes in Birkenstock-brand footwear, has provided K-State students the classics for a comfortable, stylish walk to class for 23 years.

Dian Olson, manager and co owner, said each worker at the store is a member of the Olson family, and each is interested in promoting the store's dedication and willingness to help people.

"Our family has been helping people with foot problems since 1913," Olson said.

"The best part of working here is being able to work with our customers. I love getting to help the people who come in."

The family-owned shoe store is located at 1214B Moro.

It opened in Aggieville in 1984 to serve K-State students and Manhattan residents with quality shoes and service, Olson said.

"We chose its Aggieville location because it's handicap accessible and could be available to everyone," Olson said. "A K-State student should shop here, because we do a great job fitting and repairing shoes."

The shoe store's distinct quality resides in the fact that it only sells the classic styles of Birkenstock-brand footwear, along with other quality brands of shoes, Olson said. The store also provides custom shoe repairs and has shoe repair material for purchase, she said.

Terrie McCants, Manhattan resident, is a regular at the store.

"I choose to come to this store because of the brand and service it provides to its customers," McCants said. "The shoes are comfortable and quality."

Jessica Coen, senior in elementary education, said she likes that the shoes are fashionable.

"Birkenstocks are so comfortable and last a really long time," Coen said. "But aside from that, I think they are really stylish."

Web site challenges Facebook by serving only college students

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While Facebook.com is inviting the entire world to join its ranks, a new networking Web site is doing just the opposite.

College.com is similar to Facebook, but was created solely for college students.

Sam Marks, College.com project manager and Florida State University graduate, said the site wants to provide college students with a secure network to interact exclusively with each other, to thrive academically and to simply live the college life.

"You want to go out and not worry about who's looking at your information," Marks said.

With employers and parents joining Facebook by the hundreds and peering into students' profiles, the creators of College.com recognized a need for college students to have their own private network. Users must be at least 16 years old and must register with an e-mail address from an educational institution.

"We want everyone to feel really safe and secure on the site," Marks said.

Within the next few months, College.com is adapting its site to emphasize academics, Marks said. This will give students the ability to interact with and review their professors, share flash cards and notes with classmates and view their own grades and assignments. Though professors are allowed to enter the site and interact with students, they are prohibited from seeing students' profiles and pictures, Marks said.

Anthony Osgood, a K-State member of College.com, said he is uncomfortable with how easily people can access his information on Facebook.

"I don't want the whole world to know my information," said Osgood, junior in business operations and management.

He likes the idea of conversing solely with college students who are "in the same situation" he is. Osgood also said he appreciates the applications that College.com offers.

Austin Bruss, senior at Shawnee Mission South High School in Overland Park, Kan., is a member of Facebook. He said he enjoys the convenience of Facebook in contacting his high-school friends, but likes the idea of having a network exclusively for college students.

"I think college people need that too," Bruss said.

Instead of Facebook being available to everyone, including middle-school students, Bruss said he would prefer only high school and college students on the site, because they are generally more mature than the younger Facebook crowd.

Marks said he and his fellow staff members have conducted numerous focus groups and meet once a week to discuss user feedback in an effort to discover what the average college student wants from a network.

"We have every college student as our feedback people," Marks said. "Our site is built on students and on user feedback."

The site is customized to each university, so when

K-State users sign on, they see purple, K-State's sports schedule, Manhattan's weather, a calendar of events — from personal to national — and their individual courses and professors. Greek organizations also can create groups, post events and message their members.

The "Daily Doink" is a collection of news articles that users link to College.com — some quirky, some serious. The site also features lists of top stories from popular news stations.

Users can give College.com their cell phone numbers to receive a "Wake Up" or "Bad Date" call at a specified time in case they are worried about missing class or looking for an excuse to ditch their dates.

Marks said they are recording celebrity voices like Gilbert Gottfried to use for these calls.

In the next few months, College.com plans to have promotional events at several universities whose numbers on College.com have rapidly increased. The events are tied to a nonprofit organization. Among the schools they might visit is the University of Kansas, which now has more than 120 registered users.

College.com receives more than 40,000 visitors each day and an additional 300 registrations each day, Marks said. They expect to have more than 1,000 new registrations a day by mid-October, he said.

Overall, the goal of College.com is to be "everything college," Marks said.

"We are recapturing the focus of college students," he said.

ROWING

Building a team

Photos by Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

Members of the K-State Women's rowing team practice at Tuttle Creek State Park lake Tuesday afternoon. The rowing teams search across Kansas try to entice new members onto their teams each year.

Wildcats must step up

The K-State football team that showed up to play Kansas last Saturday was a team fans haven't seen for a long time.

It wasn't the team that dominated Auburn until the final minutes of the season-opening game. It wasn't the team that dismantled San Jose State and Missouri State.

The Wildcats who destroyed Texas, 41-21, on the road and in the Big 12 Conference opener, sure didn't come to play against KU.

Those Wildcats swarmed around the field and tackled anything with a football in its hands.

During the KU game, the defense was so poor, it wouldn't have been able to tackle "the Sunshine Scooter," ESPN Analyst Lee Corso said.

The Jayhawks were able to do anything they wanted.

KU came off a bye week and forced their will upon the Wildcats. They were a step ahead of the Wildcats in every phase of the game, and they showed the passion for winning the fight.

Sound familiar?

K-State did the same thing to the Longhorns after they came off a bye.

They were the underdog road team that wasn't supposed to compete, but the Wildcats' swarming defense made Texas look slow and unprepared. K-State gained control from the start with an 80-yard touchdown drive on the game's first possession, and they never looked back.

On Saturday, Mark Mangino and the Jayhawks did much of the same.

They spread out the Wildcat defense and took their chances against one-on-one coverage in the secondary.

The game didn't start well for KU, which was pleasing to the Wildcat fans, but they quickly realized that KU was better than expected.

The Jayhawks made K-State look like Texas.

K-State looked unprepared and unwilling to take control of the game. The Wildcat defense was slow and left gaping holes for the offense.

KU took advantage.

The disappointment of losing to the Jayhawks two years in a row for the first time since 1988-1990, where they lost three in a row, hurts. The Wildcats have to get over it and prepare for a primetime showdown with Colorado on Saturday.

Colorado comes into the game on fire, winning three in a row. The middle victory in that stretch was a 27-24 shocker over then No. 3 Oklahoma.

Colorado erased a 14-point lead in the fourth quarter by running the ball right at OU, and if the K-State defense doesn't shape up, Colorado might do the same thing to the Wildcats.

Even defensive end Ian Campbell sees the potential danger of Colorado's running game.

"You saw what they did against OU — they wore them down," Campbell said. "Oklahoma is known for having a good defense. It's going to be another knockdown, drag-out fight like it was last Saturday."

The Wildcats were worn down by KU in the second half, but linebacker Reggie Walker said he has a solution to that problem for when Colorado comes to town.

"We've got to wrap up and tackle," Walker said. "If we wrap up and tackle, we'll be fine. It's basic fundamentals."

Hopefully everyone on the team takes Walker's words to heart, because if the same defense that played KU shows up against Colorado, the Wildcats could have yet another disappointing showing in front of the home crowd Saturday night.

Rowing coaches scour Kansas for new members

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Every year the K-State rowing team searches the corners of Kansas for athletes to add to its roster.

The coaches send letters to high schools asking for names of possible prospects who could be on the team — just the first step in the process to find K-State rowers.

"The first step of the process is we contact all the high schools in Kansas," coach Patrick Sweeney said. "We literally write to all the athletic directors, volleyball coaches, basketball coaches, athletic coaches and ask them if they have any good athletic women who are tall, who probably aren't going to make Division I basketball or volleyball, and who want to be at a good school playing Division I sports."

Sweeney said the next step is putting prospective athletes through an interview to decide if they will fit in with the team.

— Why in the world is a Mark Mangino-coached team 5-0? I guess it was time — I mean, he has been there six seasons.

— The one good thing about Kansas winning is that the Sunflower Showdown is starting to mean something. Maybe someday Kansas fans will understand that it is probably a better rivalry than the one they have with Missouri.

— Highly sought-after recruit running back Bryce Brown was at the game last Saturday. You think he was impressed with K-State's 53-yard rushing output? Neither do I.

— Has anyone noticed how the baseball playoffs are going? Because I haven't.

— I am really hoping K-State beats KU in Bramlage this year.

— Who would win in a fight: head basketball coach Frank Martin or Chuck Norris? I would choose Frank Martin, because he would probably call in DC Assault.

— I hope Madness in Manhattan's dunk contest doesn't make me fall asleep like last year's did.

— Fans don't have to duplicate the Wildcat growl sound at the football games.

It's not funny, so stop trying.

— Shut up about Ron Prince not being able to coach. He has owned Texas — twice.

— Mangino can beat a lot of teams with two weeks to prepare.

— It's a little weird when a school blows the whistle on themselves, but I give major props to Tim Weiser and Co. for being upfront about it. Except, I really do want to know the player's name that was cleared and currently is playing.

— I wonder if Dan Hawkins has scouted the intramural circuit lately. I think there might be some Big 12-caliber athletes there.

— Two second-year coaches face each other in Snyder Family Stadium this weekend. This game will determine who is farther along in his master plan to make his program great again.

— I think Ron Prince has the best stares. He is so stoic.

— Let's see if Colorado can handle the Kansas altitude. They probably can, but I just wanted to say that about a Colorado-based team.

Dara's in Aggieville uses sign to amuse customers

By Whitney Hodgins
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"I R rite gudder sines then U," is the current expression on Dara's Fast Lane's marquee in Aggieville.

For nearly 10 years, this Dara's — located on the corner of Laramie and 11th streets — has amused passersby with the quirky sayings it displays on the marquee. The phrases occasionally advertise the goods inside, but employees said they take advantage of their close proximity to Aggieville to lighten the mood and make people laugh.

The atmosphere inside the Dara's in Aggieville certainly is lighter than that of the average convenience store, said employee Andrea Granger.

She said this can be good for the business, considering its greatest customer base is drunken college students — desperate for a late-night cigarette or energy drink.

"We try to make the signs funny because it's a lot of fun," said Granger, sophomore in international agriculture business. "We target students and night-life — but wouldn't be able to get away with so much in the more residential areas like Candlewood."

Granger said there are about seven employees who decide what is displayed on the marquee, but the store's manager must approve the ideas before they are implemented.

So how do phrases like: "Selling Coke by the oz. since 2001!" and "We have what you need: nicotine, caffeine, and sugar!" get past management?

"Our manager tries to come up with some signs too," Granger said. "It's almost like a competition, because we all want to have the funniest one."

Kelly Unekis, who has worked at Dara's for two years, said customers sometimes call to complain about the content of a particular phrase.

"It doesn't bother us when people call in," Unekis, Manhattan resident, said. "It's never a big deal, because we just put up a different one."

Frequent customer Michael Moore said he looks forward to seeing what is written on the marquee every day. His property-management office is across Laramie Street, and he said he visits the Dara's at least once a day.

"It's not meant in any way except in good humor," Moore said. "They provide great service and are really nice. I have no problem with their signs at all."

Unekis said the store considered allowing customers to decide the content for the marquee in the past, however, he was worried the results could be unintentionally hurtful. If Moore was given the chance, however, he knows what he would spell out.

"When you see the Brinks truck, it means cigarettes are being delivered!"

Kyle Steppe, senior in psychology, sends a ball down the lanes in the K-State Student Union bowling alley Wednesday afternoon. Bowling, billiards and video games are some of the many things to do in the Union to hang out between classes.

Chris Vail, freshman in pre-architecture engineering, passes time between class by playing a game of pool Wednesday. Vail said he has two days a week when he goes to the K-State Student Union basement to pass time.

Geoffrey Brubaker, Manhattan resident, gets a workout with the "Dance Dance Revolution" game in the basement of the K-State Student Union arcade. Brubaker said he had not played the dancing game since the arcade in the mall closed.

Union basement offers variety of food, activities with special deals

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If you have extra time on your hands and a few dollars in your pocket, chances are good there is an activity in the basement of the K-State Student Union in which you can participate.

With a golf simulator, a 16-lane bowling alley, a video arcade, billiards tables and a Subway restaurant, there are many ways to kill time.

The Union basement offers several special promotions throughout the week and low prices to students every day. Rock'It Bowl is a special on Friday nights and Subway's foot-long deal is offered all day Tuesdays.

The bowling alley, which was originally in Union Station and had only eight lanes, is a popular attraction.

While the lanes have sustained a loss in business because of the parking-garage construction, league attendance has not seen a drop in participants, said Terri Eddy, recreation manager for the Union.

"We gave all league members a free locker for the duration of the construction, and we offer leagues Monday to Thursday nights," Eddy said.

Eddy said before the construction, Friday and Saturday nights were the busiest nights of the week, but that is not the case now.

In an attempt to draw more people out to the lanes, some nights of the week have been designated for special events. For example, on Friday nights from 10:30 p.m. to 1:00 a.m., Rock'It Bowl is available.

"That's where we turn off the lights and turn the black lights on," said Eddy. "We also crank up the music and bring a DJ in here."

Every Thursday night, the Union promotes "Thursday Starts the Weekend." The deal includes $1 each for shoe rental, draws of Bud Light, Budweiser, Miller Light, Coors light, and billiards.

In addition to bowling specials, the Union offers beer specials like the 16-ounce draws for $1.50 on Monday nights. The Union also has several billiards tables, but they are not as popular as the lanes.

"A lot of people will get a billiards table while they are waiting for a lane," Eddy said.

The selection of tables includes 13-pocket billiards tables and one snooker table. Five of the pocket billiards tables are actually from the original construction of the Union in 1956, Eddy said.

Irakli Svintradze, graduate student in physics, said he plays billiards three to four times a week in the basement.

"I usually come down here with friends, but it just depends," Svintradze said.

He said he plays for about an hour each time.

If you are hungry and in the basement, there is a Subway franchise that offers the full Subway menu.

Tuesday is by far the most popular day for Subway, said Robert Conner, manager of the franchise in the Union.

Every Tuesday, from open to close, the restaurant offers all its foot-long sandwiches for half price.

"Right now it includes all of the sandwiches, but on the 22nd (of October) we are coming out with a new sandwich — the Double Meat Brisket — and that one won't be available for the deal," Conner said.

There is also a video arcade in the basement that boasts a wide variety of games. Games like "Monopoly Pinball," "Turkey Hunter USA" and "Cruisin' USA: Exotica" are available, as well as opportunities to get in shape.

Geoff Brubaker, Manhattan resident, said he uses the game "Dance Dance Revolution" to keep fit.

"It's a great way to exercise," Brubaker said.

Brubaker said he played the game at Aladdin's Castle in the Manhattan Town Center, but after it closed, he started playing at the Union.

A company called Bird Music owns all the video games in the Union.

The golf simulator does not get a lot of use, Eddy said.

She said there are a few faithful golfers who use it, but the simulator is not utilized by very many non-golfers.

"There are eight courses that you can play, along with a driving range and a closest-to-the-pin option," Eddy said.

The cost of the simulator is $8 an hour and is open the same hours as the rest of the basement area.

Jon Lytle, junior in horticulture management, said working in the basement is one of the best jobs he has had.

"I like it because of all the students I get to meet," Lytle said. "I also like it when people who come in recognize me out on the street."

Crimpers Too, a smaller version of the Aggieville salon, has a room in the basement, but does not offer the same services that are offered at the Aggieville location.

While the parking-garage construction might be an obstacle for some students when deciding whether to go to the Union, the variety of activities in one location and proximity to campus might be a convincing factor.

Band's new 'noisy, cluttered' album features some of its best songs

Animal Collective "Strawberry Jam"

Album review by Mark Sibilla

The Baltimore-cum-Brooklyn band Animal Collective is without a doubt one of the most important and creative bands of this decade. Throughout the course of several albums, EPs and solo works, the band has grown tremendously over the course of its short tenure.

The main creative minds behind Animal Collective are Avey Tare and Panda Bear (aka Dave Porter and Noah Lennox, respectively), and sound processor Geologist and guitarist Deakin join them in creating manic musical landscapes that are equal parts ecstatic, noisy, cluttered, spacey and fun.

For a band that creates such blissed-out orgiastic aural collages, it would be easy to overwhelm the listener with random sounds, shouts and tempo changes, but Animal Collective has honed its art so well through the course of just a few years, that the excesses in the music never seem excessive.

The band's latest album, "Strawberry Jam," is Animal Collective's best album to date — and that is saying something, considering the band's strong discography. Animal Collective moves even farther from freak-folk and noise experimentation and begins to become more accessible, further improving upon the psychedelic pop freak-outs prominent in the 2005 album, "Feels."

"Peacebone" opens the album with a disorienting blur of synthesizer bleeps and blips that is eventually tempered when a pounding tom drum enters and gives the noise a rhythm around which to coalesce.

When Avey enters with his verbose lyrics, the first major change becomes evident. Where past releases found Animal Collective burying the vocals under layers of sound and reverb, "Strawberry Jam" removes this and lets the vocals take center stage. While this change takes a little adjustment, it is ultimately rewarding, because it allows the extremely emotive vocals of Avey and Panda to take precedent. Rather than being lost in the music, the vocals now are able to roam freely throughout the expansive sonic terrain created by the rest of the band.

The second track, "Unsolved Mysteries," finds Panda taking the helm over an insistent staccato guitar rhythm and what sounds like a calliope on acid. The track slowly builds to a climax of crashing cymbals and pounding drums where Panda asks "What's pain?/What's sadness anyway?/It's not crying like a child."

While many of the lyrics are either non-sequiturs or strange poetic musings that often infer feelings rather than explicitly state them, it is these occasional bursts of insight into the human condition that make Animal Collective truly special.

The hyper, in-your-face track "Chores" begins with frenzied drumming, shimmering synth lines and a whirl of melodic backing vocals. At the song's halfway point, "Chores" takes a dramatic left turn as it veers into a tribal campfire sing-along complete with a thumping drum rhythm and vocal melodies that ebb and flow beautifully. It is very reminiscent of the music from Paul Simon's seminal album, "Graceland."

The album's midsection contains not only the two best songs on the album, but also some of the best songs of Animal Collective's career. "For Reverend Green" and "Fireworks" are both similar in their approach but are distinctly different in their execution.

"For Reverend Green" is propelled by a driving synthesizer and thundering toms. Avey sings about coping with angst brought on by relationships, his body and his own self-image. Throughout the song, Avey punctuates many of the lyrics with throaty howls that give the song an added emotional heft.

"Fireworks" has less dense production, but its innocence and multiple simple, childlike vocal melodies help create a song that is truly moving and beautiful. There are three main sections in "Fireworks." Each section utilizes the same musical ingredients but uses changing tempos and chords to create and release tension.

The remainder of "Strawberry Jam" is more experimental but no less accessible. Songs like the Terry Riley-influenced "1" and the exciting "Cuckoo Cuckoo" find Animal Collective still willing to explore new sounds and songwriting styles without abandoning the band's identity.

Ultimately, "Strawberry Jam" is a triumph of an album. It not only the best Animal Collective has created, but it is undoubtedly one of the year's best releases. With "Strawberry Jam," Animal Collective has made an album as sweet as its namesake.

ROW | Coaches search for members on volleyball, basketball teams around to the basketball and volleyball games and actually pick out kids, and that's where the large number comes from."

Sweeney said he looks every season to add anywhere from 30 to 40 new women to the team. When school starts, the team has meetings to find walk-on athletes, and the number of women on the potential roster reaches about 100. During the fall schedule, Sweeney looks to cut the number of the team down to about 70 athletes.

Sweeney said the girls entering the team usually know nothing about the sport of rowing, so the coaches have to teach them the basics. Through teaching and training, the women learn the sport while becoming stronger.

"We are teaching them the basis of technique," said Sweeney. "We are teaching them from square one, and we are just making them stronger and fitter."

Because rowing is an equivalency scholarship sport, Sweeney said the team does not give anyone full scholarships. Instead, they give out numbers based on a hierarchy scale with their ranking on the team.

"It's an equivalency sport like baseball, so we split out 20 equivalency (scholarships) among the team," Sweeney said. "What we do is we don't bring anyone in on a full scholarship or anything — we bring them in on a hierarchy. They progress, they get a little bit more."

The rowing squad is taking part in a fall schedule that includes three events.

These events help the coaching staff narrow down who will be in what boat on the team.

Sweeney said the fall schedule helps the coaches bring the number of athletes down to the aim of 70 and is the first opportunity the coaches get to see the new athletes in competition.

The Wildcats participate in the Head of the Iowa on Oct. 28 in Iowa City and then return home for the Sunflower Showdown on Nov. 10.

"Staph is very common," Blubaugh said. "Twenty-five to 35 percent of the United States population carries staph at all times, so it is important they have good hygiene because it is the easiest way for people to prevent it from spreading."

A recent problem with the spread of staph infection affected students in the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 school district about a month ago.

Michele Jones, Manhattan High School's coordinator of communications and public relations, said the school's west campus has not had any new cases of staph on their campus for two-and-a-half weeks.

She said two weeks ago, there was a special forum to inform parents, students and faculty about staph and to remind everyone how to prevent infection. The Kansas Department of Health, Riley County Health Department, and four local physicians were there to provide answers and solutions for concerned parents.

"We are not sure how the staph infection was started, but the spread of the infection was started with a couple of guys on the football team who had abrasions, which got infected," Jones said.

She said the players went to their physicians, who diagnosed it as staph infection. There were 12 confirmed cases of the infection — all of which were football players and students.

"The students who did not play sports had to be on antibiotics for 24 hours, and the students that played sports had to be on antibiotics for 48 hours and all open wounds covered continuously," Jones said.

Jones said after the outbreak, additional cleaning products were brought in to thoroughly disinfect the football equipment and mats.

Kennedy said people can get a staph infection at any time. It is important people be knowledgeable when they have an open wound and have been in close contact with others. They should check out cuts and report if there are any lesions forming on their skin.

Kennedy said it is also possible for staph to cause pneumonia but it is not as common.

features a father standing next to his unmarried daughter. The painting is known for containing strict, austere structure and not having very much color. It is commonly seen as a celebration of austere Midwest values, González said.

"Chicano Gothic," by Amado M. Peña Jr., shows two Chicano men standing side by side in front of a tortilleria. In contrast to Wood's painting, "Chicano Gothic" employs more vibrant colors. The two men in the painting are celebrating, and their bodies stand at relaxed angles.

"Tilting it after a mainstream image in American art automatically inserts it into the American narrative," González said. "But it evokes a completely different American experience than the original."

The third item, "Sun Mad," parodied the image from the Sun-Maid raisins box.

The skin and flesh of the woman usually shown on the box of Sun-Maid raisins is replaced with a skeleton, still wearing the maid's red bonnet, white blouse and holding the basket of green grapes.

The skeletal image is called a cadavera. In Mexico, the cadavera first appeared in newspapers during the administration of President Porfirio Díaz in the early 20th century. Artists would draw subjects doing ordinary, everyday tasks like housework or walking through town, while the people were represented as skeletons.

This image quickly became an essential part of Mexican folk art, and often illustrated things that the government was doing to citizens.

"This cadavera represents workers," González said. "The people picking your grapes are skeletons. They work in harsh conditions."

The fourth work of art González showed was "Margaret F. Stewart: Our Lady of Guadalupe" by Yolanda M. Lopez.

Playing off of the image of La Virgen de Guadalupe, or the Virgin Mary, a powerful icon in Latin culture, "Margaret F. Stewart" portrayed a dark-skinned woman hunched behind a sewing machine, stitching a U.S. flag. The woman is outlined by a bright glow, which is also found in depictions of La Virgen.

Some audience members said "Margaret F. Stewart" was the most memorable piece in González' presentation.

"It really put front and center the way Latinas are literally at the forefront of making America," Roshanravan said.

La Virgen is a significant part of Latino culture, religion, and its roots, said Uriel Estrada, Hispanic American Leadership Organization president and senior in secondary education.

"I've been drilled with images of the Virgin Mary since I was a little kid," Estrada said. "It was nice to see this Chicano representation."

STOP | Actors have chance to gain different perspective with roles

and not too confused."

From the production's beginning, Anderson said cast members built a rapport and bond based on their roles. She also said Gillespie and Perez approached their roles with professionalism and maturity.

"I think that's one of the things that I love about theater," Anderson said. "It's such a humanizing art form because you truly do try to stand in someone else's shoes, get behind someone else's eyes and experience and see the world from a different perspective."

After her first "Stop Kiss" script read-through, Gillespie said the reality and human nature of the show's characters impressed her.

"All of the characters in the show can be related to in some way," she said. "They all have really pivotal action points in the show."

Gillespie said "Stop Kiss" is a play of many firsts for her — her first lead role in a K-State production, her first portrayal of a protagonist character and her first kiss with a woman.

"It's a challenge now," she said. "It has been through the development, but it's been so much fun."

Perez, who has acted in more than 20 high-school and collegiate productions, said she first read the "Stop Kiss" script in high school and almost auditioned with it for a K-State scholarship.

"I wasn't ready for it in high school, but now at the college level, I was ready to take on something that really challenged every part of my acting," she said.

During "Stop Kiss" auditions, Perez said she originally wanted a role other than Sara. However, she said she changed her mind at the last minute and circled all available roles.

Sara's sexual orientation is a subject matter that Perez said she had little prior exposure with.

"She does have a different sexual preference than I do, but she just loves like the rest of us do," Perez said. "It was kind of hard to grasp, but I took it as more of a challenge."

Audience members, especially college students, will relate with "Stop Kiss" characters because they are in their 20s and in the process of finding their identities, Gillespie said.

"It's just like in any relationships when there are sparks and connections between characters," she said. "The fact that they are two women is part of the play, but the audience needs to be open-minded in the fact that relationships happen to everyone."

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A St. George, Kan., man failed to return to the Riley County Jail after being released for a short period of time for medical reasons, a Riley County police officer said.

Jeffrey Leivan, 38, was supposed to return to the jail by 5 p.m. on Oct. 8, but he still has not shown, said Riley County Police Department Lt. Kurt Moldrup.

Leivan originally was charged and confined for aggravated battery, Moldrup said.

SGA calls for bill for referendum

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Student Senate introduced a bill Thursday evening calling for a student referendum, or vote, on the proposed expansion to the Peters Recreation Complex.

Mike Mayo, an architect at Ebert Mayo Design Group, spoke about the proposed expansion of the rec. He said the expansion would add 45,000 square feet to the rec.

The expansion would include an extra gym similar to the larger two larger gyms in the Union, an extra all-purpose room across from the gyms, expansion of the weights and fitness equipment area and a 45-foot climbing wall. Mayo said the new gym will be surfaced differently, allowing for a more all-purpose use.

Mayo also said the elevated track will be extended by several yards. He said it takes eight laps to run a mile now, but it will take just five laps to run a mile with the expansion. The expansion will also add a south entrance which would look similar to the north entrance, as well as a south parking lot.

"What you get an opportunity to do, if you choose, is to continue the tradition of enhancing things at the university," Mayo said. "Some of you will get to use it, and some of your kids will get to use it."

Ebert Mayo designed the first expansion of the rec in 1993.

The bill proposed a referendum question asking if students would be in favor of an expansion of more than 150 percent. The question also states a $20 student fee will be charged from fiscal year 2009-2011 and increase to $40 for the remaining years of the bond. Student Body President Matt Wagner said the $22.50 student fee for the 1993 expansion will remain until 2013, when it expires.

If approved, construction of the expansion would begin next fall.

"The idea of this is that for the first three years, students will pay less because they won't use it," Wagner said. "People will pay more later because they will be able to use it."

Student Senate will vote on the referendum bill on Oct. 18.

Rec center director Steve Martini said the expansion is needed because the center ranks low compared to other Big 12 schools.

"There is a study that benchmarks all the different standings in the Big 12 ... and I'll tell you we're lowest," Martini said. "We are No. 12. As for student usage, we are around seventh."

The senate approved a bill to create a special committee to review the K-State Student

Officials recommend flu vaccinations

By Jelani Yancey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Megan Crane came down with a fever on Friday, Feb. 11, 2005. For her, the rest of that weekend was full of chills, aches and hot flashes.

"I would be shivering cold one second and put the blankets on," she said. "Fifteen minutes later, I'd be sweating; I'd throw all the blankets off, at which point I'd get chills again."

Officials at Lafene Health Center told her she was showing classic flu symptoms, and they prescribed medication for her. Crane said she felt better within 24 hours of taking it.

The next flu season, Crane did not take any chances. She got vaccinated, and she plans to do it again this year.

"Given my experience with the flu, I would highly recommend that anyone who has access to a flu vaccine get one," said Crane, junior in English and international studies.

Influenza symptoms are typically much like pneumonia, said Erin Lord, senior administrative assistant at Lafene Health Promotions office.

"The body usually feels a lot of achiness all over, high fevers and cold sweats," she said.

Additional symptoms include headache, tiredness, a cough, sore throat, and runny or stuffy nose, according to the Centers for Disease Control.

Stephen K. Chapes, professor of immunology, said he has received the vaccine regularly for the past 8-10 years.

"With flu vaccines, you get very good immunity," Chapes said. "The problem is the virus mutates annually, or different strains show up annually."

Since the virus changes annually, last year's vaccine might not be as effective this year, Chapes said.

In general, college students share risk factors that raise their susceptibility to contracting the flu beyond that of the population at large.

"For those who live in the dorms, living in close proximity to so many people increases the likelihood of contracting influenza," Crane said.

In addition to being around people, the changes in local temperature and weather wear down students' immune systems, Lord said.

The months of September and October — right before the weather changes drastically — are the best months to get vaccinated, Lord said. This also depends on the local supply of the vaccine.

Shortages have occurred every year for the last few years, said Susanne Kufahl, assistant administrator at Riley County Health Department.

"Suppliers, practitioners and health departments don't necessarily get the entire winter's stock of vaccines right away," she said.

If shortages occur, they generally take place early in the flu season. Suppliers usually restock quickly after that, and people can return to their providers within a few weeks if the vaccine was not available right away, Kufahl said.

Kufahl said the health department does not expect shortages this year.

The influenza vaccine is available at Lafene Health Center's flu clinic every Thursday until Nov. 15, Lord said. Shots cost $14 for K-State students and $19 for faculty and staff.

"You don't have to have an appointment," Lord said. "You can just walk on in."

The vaccine is also available as a nasal mist, which costs $23 for students and $28 for faculty.

Chapes said using the nasal mist may generate a more natural "host response" than having the which costs $23 for students and $28 for faculty.

Panelists discuss U.S. incarceration rates, prisoners' rights

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

About 6 billion people populate earth. Eight million people are in prison.

Two and a half million of those prisoners are incarcerated in the United States, which is more than 25 percent of the world's prisoners, a panelist during the discussion "The Untold Tale: Mass Incarceration, The Drug War, and Racial Justice," in Forum Hall in the K-State Student Union.

The four panelists, Peter Wagner, Gabriel Sayegh, Zachary Norris and Travis Linnemann, discussed the incarceration rate and what problems it creates. The K-State and Manhattan Alliance for Peace and Justice chapters sponsored the panel discussion.

"(Prison) has essentially become the major apparatus by which our society deals with a whole range of social problems ... In the rest of the world they deal with some of those problems by providing universal healthcare or free access to education, or parks for kids and things for people to do," Sayegh said.

Sayegh is the director of the State Organizing Policy Project of the Drug Policy Alliance, a group whose vision is to show the War on Drugs is doing more harm than good and people should be punished not by what they put into their bodies but by harm they do to others, according to the alliance's Web site, www.drugpolicy.org.

One of the biggest problems, he said, is that everyone is connected to the war on drugs, but nobody talks about it, Sayegh said.

"Probably no one in this room that's not been touched by drug abuse, by drug addiction, by incarceration, by police harassment, by brutality and yet we tend to never talk about these things," he said.

The drug problem will never be solved until people end the silence, he said.

"Until we get engaged, we're gonna continue being mired in this war that has gone on for 35 years and essentially has done nothing but cost millions of lives and tens of billions of dollars, and these are our lives, there our dollars," he said. "We gotta figure a way out of it."

Panelist Peter Wagner is the executive director of the Prison Policy Initiative, a group dedicated to empowering the community to build a better criminal justice policy through research, according to the group's Web site, www.prisonpolicy.org.

From 1925 to about 1975, the number of people in prison stayed relatively at the same level, Wagner said. Starting in the 1980s, the number rose dramatically.

"There was a policy shift in this country to give out more sentences and to give out longer sentences and the total number of people incarcerated went up," he said.

This causes a political problem, Wagner said, because the U.S. counts prisoners in the population number, and state voting districts are divided based on population, which are based on the census numbers. This, he said, creates inequality between the districts.

"In 48 states, prisoners can't vote, and in 13 states, some or all of people who have finished their sentences are not allowed to vote, and in 30 states, people who are not imprisoned but are on probation of parole are barred from voting," he said. "That's a pretty big group of people that's cut off from the political process."

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

Speaking in Forum Hall in the Student Union, Peter Wagner, executive director of Prison Policy Initiative, begins the panel "The Untold Tale: Mass Incarceration, the Drug War and Racial Justice." Wagner was one of four members of the panel, with a question-and-answer session after the presentation. The K-State Alliance for Peace and Justice and the Manhattan Alliance for Peace and Justice both organized the event.

This problem, Wagner said, is not to be blamed on the census, because it was an accident. However, he said it is an accident that could and should be fixed.

"This is an accident, but it hasn't been fixed, because it benefits certain interest," he said.

Panelist Zachary Norris works with the Books Not Bars campaign, a San Francisco based group dedicated to redirecting and getting more of California's resources to go toward youth opportunities, instead of toward youth incarceration, according to the campaign's Web site, www.ellabakercenter.org.

Norris discussed the problems with the juvenile justice system. He said often schools officials try to solve problems by referring or sending children to juvenile detention facilities.

"In Florida, in the year 2004 alone there were 26,000 referrals from schools to the Florida Division of Juvenile Justice," Norris said. "Three-fourths of those for misdemeanors, for things like disturbing a school event, and that's a literal misdemeanor — assault, many of them basically school-yard fights."

Company unexpectedly pulls language program from libraries

By Emily Aldredge
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Susan Withee was thrilled when the library opted to subscribe to the Rosetta Stone because she had always wanted to learn Italian.

"I told myself that if I learned Italian, I would take myself to Italy," said Withee, an employee in the reference department at the Manhattan Public Library.

However, last week she received a letter from Rosetta Stone that said the company had decided to discontinue subscriptions for public libraries. Withee said the letter left everyone at the library in shock.

Withee is one of 400 people who use the library's Rosetta Stone language program, she said. Now the library must find a new language company and will need to explain to the program's users why they are going to be cut off from their language learning program.

Rosetta Stone is a computer-based language program that advertises a "guaranteed way to learn a new language." It is known for fast, user-friendly lessons and accelerated learning, according to its Web site, rosettastone.com.

The idea of offering a way for library-card holders to learn a new language started when people were waiting weeks to check out the limited compact discs available, Withee said.

The Rosetta Stone Company was advertising its program in library periodicals and specifically targeting public libraries, she said. It was still advertising and signing libraries to its online language program until right before the company decided to discontinue the service.

One library on the online list-serve had signed up just two weeks ago, Withee said.

When the Manhattan Library staff members heard about the program, they jumped on the idea, because users would be able to access five different languages from their home or work computer, Withee said.

"You need to be somewhere where you can say the words out loud, and they can do that at home," she said. "We wanted to make it available to anyone with a library card."

Spanish, French, Italian, Arabic and Japanese are all available with the Rosetta Stone online, Withee said, and the people who use the program are as diverse as the languages available.

She said users range from college students brushing up their Spanish for class to soldiers from Fort Riley learning Arabic before they deploy. Anyone can become fluent in a second or third language, Withee said.

She said Spanish is the most popular language requested in the reference department, followed closely by French and Italian. The library staff members were asked to add Chinese and German to the languages offered, but they did not want to pay to subscribe to more languages from a program that will not exist in three months.

The library paid $3,500 for a year's subscription and endless online access. Now, the company is trying to pacify libraries that are angry by giving them the option to buy sets of language CDs. The CDs would cost less because the Rosetta Stone is cutting the public libraries a deal, Withee said.

Peggy Lohmann, director of public relations for Rosetta Stone, said she encourages libraries to buy the new version of the Rosetta Stone in CD form when their subscription expires.

"It's not like we are leaving them completely in the dust," Lohmann said. "We are giving them an alternative option."

Withee said the problem with the CDs is the library patrons will be forced to use them in the library, making it impossible, or at least rude, to repeat the words out loud as they learn.

"Since everyone is so ticked off, they are offering a decreased price to libraries who have used it," Withee said.

While the CDs might be less expensive, the library still has the problem of deciding how it will cater to the people who already have started language programs. Withee said the reference department must make that decision by the end of November.

The library is deciding between the CD sets from Rosetta Stone and similar products from other companies, but the big concern is finding a program that is equally as effective and user-friendly as Rosetta Stone, she said.

The Language Learning Center in Eisenhower Hall uses the Rosetta Stone CDs, but it will not be affected by the new development, said Lorena Barboza, Spanish professor and head of the learning center.

She said students rarely use the program.

"We have the software but few, if any, use it," she said. "This semester only about two students asked about it."

As for the program users at the library, Withee said they can continue to use the program until December and then either check out the CDs or use an alternative program. She said the library staff blames Rosetta Stone for advertising a product that was going to be taken off the market soon.

"It means that you are getting people involved in a program that is going to be pulled out from under them," Withee said. "It is embarrassing for us."

TO THE POINT

Philanthropy misses point of its cause

A number of events and organizations that are fighting for causes fly by each semester, and these philanthropies usually provide awareness about the issue for which they are raising money or awareness.

It seems reasonable to assume they have good intentions and are striving to achieve something beyond daily campus life.

However, when the promotion of the organization is emphasized more than the actual cause, do the good intentions still exist?

The recent Dew for Darfur campaign is intended to help the conflict in Darfur, but to achieve that goal the ambassadors thought it would be best to use the $5,000 from PepsiCo to provide students with cash prizes and games.

Instead of learning about the crisis in Darfur, students will get plenty of free Mountain Dew and other promotional items.

So why is it "Dew for Darfur?" Because the alliteration of the D's makes for a fun title, one of the ambassadors said.

Is this really the best community-service project these ambassadors can come up with? What is next - Sierra Mist for Somalia? What about Gatorade for the Gaza Strip? At least the ambassadors are reminding students that they will accept donations to give to UNICEF.

So while students are working hard in the Dew pong tournament and the dunk tank for the prize money, Darfur is silently waits for contributions.

It's great the ambassadors want to do something with the project, but Darfur would benefit more from the $5,000 than the random Dew events.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

We are told here at K-State that students are privileged to have access to the diversity of thought in classes, activities and programs. Again we are told we are given the opportunity to express our ideas and allow them to compete in the marketplace of ideas. However, conservative students feel institutions on this campus are selling only one side of the debate.

According to the Union Program Council Web site, "... UPC students determine the films you see on weekends, select the comedians that make you laugh, choose the art exhibited in the William T. Kemper Art Gallery, decide which controversial issues speakers address, expose you to different cultures with our multicultural programming ..."

However, UPC has yet to give students a conservative option on their election concerning who they should bring to K-State with our money.

Of the nine choices, four of them are considered neutral. Those include the host of the television show "Dirty Jobs," a CSI profiler, a Holocaust survivor and a program titled "Iraq: The Untold Stories."

The remaining five have a strong left-wing bias. Starting from the left of center and moving farther out, this list includes Maya Angelou, the show "The Vagina Monologues," a speaker on the importance of abortion rights, Air America host Robert Kennedy Jr., and finally the Rev. Jesse Jackson.

Four neutral and five left - quite a diverse group of thought we have stemming from the minds of UPC.

Praise has to be given to the grassroots conservative groups on campus who have challenged this list at public forums concerning speakers and using the "other" section on the ballot.

Three weeks ago, K-State was host to its annual Community Cultural Harmony Week where students were exposed to "diverse" thoughts on campus that were supposed to bring us closer together as a community, but if anything, it drove us farther apart.

The name alone suppresses feelings of opposition toward the topic.

In the with-us-or-against-us feeling, anyone who speaks out against the program is considered to be against community, culture and harmony.

Secondly, the list of events highlighted almost every point dividing our culture. If true cultural harmony is the goal, concentrating on the similarities and understanding is the means to break down these "walls" or "glass ceilings" separating us.

Events like the workshop "Gender Differences," put on by Juanita Cox-Burton, which spent the first half discussing "white privilege" before even getting to the topic of the workshop - the speeches by Loretta Ross and the Student Panel on Diversity - all specifically targeted individuals and groups both here on campus and throughout the nation.

The key is dialogue, not supporting the suppression of speech and thought from one side. When I took the job as opinion editor of the Collegian, I made the promise to increase debate on campus, which is why I was against the removal of the column on Wednesday - even speech that some might have considered offensive is still beneficial to the discussion as a whole.

John Galt, a character in Ayn Rand's famous 1957 novel "Atlas Shrugged," said, "The only value men can offer me is the work of their mind. When I disagree with a rational man, I let reality be our final arbiter; if I am right, he will learn; if I am wrong, I will. One of us will win, but both will profit."

Disagreement about columns brings debate. Debates are argued with facts, exposing both sides to evidence and thus expanding education.

Education brings change, and change is what allows us to grow as individuals. We cannot grow completely when our minds are forced in one direction.

Pop culture changes man's legacy

He was an idealist - a poetry-loving executioner. An atheist, physician and Marxist revolutionary. He was a killer to some and a savior to others.

Now, 40 years after his death, the lines have blurred to make him a hero, a pop-culture phenomenon who is, in his own country at least, seen as something of a saint. On Oct. 9 of this year, people across the world celebrated the life and death of Ernesto Guevara de la Serna, or as the world calls him now, Che.

To the people of America, his stoic, beret-wearing image is recognized from album covers, bumper stickers and countless T-shirts. In this country the revolution might not have been televised, but like television, it has been mass-produced, covered in advertisements and edited for content.

To the people of South America, it is completely different. His views, which are now viewed as his ideals, have become a rallying point for change. He greatly influenced Argentina, his native country, Cuba, where he helped hand power to a young lawyer named Fidel Castro, and Bolivia, where he made his last guerilla stand and met his death. In the Bolivian village of La Higuera, where Guevara was killed, there are no gun-toting revolutionaries, no armed resistance cutting down hundreds in the name of Communism.

Instead there are doctors giving free medical care and Cuban missionaries chanting, "Seremos como el Che!" which in English means, "We will be like Che!"

Oddly enough, one of the men receiving treatment was Mario Teran, the Bolivian soldier who killed Guevara, according to the Los Angeles Times.

For many it is easy to wonder what Guevara would have thought of all this - the T-shirts and the privileged white teenagers who sport them in a show of teenage angst.

In Bolivia, people touring the old revolutionary's trail now stop at shrines to "Santo Ernesto" in tribute to a man who did not believe in any kind of god.

Guevara would have been appalled to know his message of violence has gone through the filter of time and popular culture and come out as one of peace, which - in the end - could do more good than the man himself ever accomplished.

Guevara is an example of the perfect martyr, a man who in the people's minds is now more of a movement than an individual.

Thousands of people chant his name and wear his banner with no actual knowledge of the man behind the legend.

Forty years have passed since his death, there are few people now who actually remember him, what he was like or the way he spoke about his beliefs. People say hindsight is 20/20, but not when looked at through rose-colored glasses.

So many heroes are seen this way. Their stories are blown so far out of proportion that the original message is lost. George Washington didn't cut down a cherry tree, though it is said he was honest to the core.

Paul Revere wasn't the only man out riding that night, but his face alone is immortalized.

William Wallace didn't cry out "Freedom!" as he was drawn and quartered, though he said he would never bow to King Edward.

It is time these myths were stripped away, and one man's strength of purpose and iron will to do right by his people is seen. Che Guevara might be rolling in his grave at how his name is now paraded, but more likely, he's laughing.

In regards to Chuck Armstrong's article, I

It's 40 degrees outside, and I just saw a Wendell at the Stuni.

I am surprised there is nothing today about the Cleveland, Ohio, school shooting in your newspaper, and that is pretty ridiculous. You would rather talk about Crocodile and snakeskin handbags are some of this fashion season's hottest commodities.

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Various reptile-style accessories popular on runways

Rattle your sense of style this season with one of the biggest style crazes in the fashion industry: crocodile and snakeskin accessories.

These prints have been appearing everywhere on the Milan, Paris and New York runways in super-sleek styles for handbags, belts and shoes. The best part about this trend is that it is extremely easy to find. Walk into any department or chain store, and you're guaranteed to see a few reptile-printed items. Crocodile and snakeskin printed accessories range from fully-covered items to slightly detailed.

Full-coverage skins look best on thick, dyed or natural cinch belts for women or classic brown and black skinny-pant belts for men. Another great full-coverage look is the all-over reptile shoe.

ELISE PODHAJSKY

The most chic style for women is a completely covered closed-toe pump or stiletto.

These can be found at any department or shoe-specialty store in a range of colors and prints. The all-over croc or snakeskin loafer is extremely popular and equally eye-catching for men.

A plain black skinned loafer is a more subtle look, while the edgier, more fashion-forward man might want to try a bright purple, orange or salmon color. Wallets, handbags, clutches, and checkbook and passport covers all work well with a solid covering.

Though these all-over accessories are a great, bold look — they can be taken too far. Try to stay away from snakeskin jackets and crocodile pants. You'll definitely attract some attention, but it might not be the kind you're looking for.

If the all-over look is a bit too much animal for you, go for something with just a hint of reptile. A great example of this is the Chanel White Cambrion handbag with neutral color snakeskin on the trademark "CC." Women also can look for wedges or stilettos with detailing on just the heel, and men can find loafers with skin prints on only the tassels.

Both full-coverage and detailed accessories come in neutral and natural colors, but the trendiest look for the style is brights. Snake and crocodile skins dyed hot pink, turquoise, kelly green, metallic, luscious red and vibrant yellow were found all over the runways in wallets, clutches, belts and shoes.

However, the idea of carrying around a bag or slipping on a pair of shoes that crawled on an earlier life might be a little scary to some, but don't worry. Most of the snake and crocodile accessories found in local retail and department stores are faux prints.

The only time you will find a truly skinned accessory is if it is designer. Though the fake skins are of a lesser quality than the designer brands, faux reptile items are considerably less expensive and a lot easier to find.

This is a trend both men and women can jump into and find endless possibilities.

Either way, you're sure to spice up your wardrobe and leave yourself with a whole croc of eye-catching accessories.

'Bourne' is best sequel of year

"The Bourne Ultimatum"

Movie review by Brendan Praeger

If you missed "The Bourne Ultimatum" this summer, catch it this weekend in the K-State Student Union.

"Ultimatum," the third chapter in the series based on Robert Ludlum's spy novels, displays the same intensity as the previous films.

The film actually begins before the final scene in the second film, "The Bourne Supremacy."

Jason Bourne is brought out of hiding inadvertently by a London-based reporter trying to unveil Operation BlackBriar — an upgrade to Project Treadstone — in a series of newspaper columns. Information from the reporter stirs a new set of memories, and Bourne finally must uncover his dark past while dodging the Company's best efforts in trying to eradicate him.

If you've never seen the previous films, the plot probably will not make much sense. Even if you have seen them, it might be a little confusing. Luckily, the plot isn't what makes this film great. All you need to know is that Bourne is an assassin with amnesia. He wants to know how he got that way, and his former employers want him dead.

The script, written by Tony Gilroy, flies by at a blinding pace. Director Paul Greengrass films everything with such high intensity that you'll actually be exhausted by the time the film ends. Gilroy also wrote George Clooney's "Michael Clayton," which opens in Manhattan this weekend.

Matt Damon's performance is excellent, though his dialogue is kept to a minimum. He's the perfect antithesis to action heroes like Bruce Willis and Jason Statham, who display a shoot-first attitude.

In a summer full of sequels, "Ultimatum" easily sits at the top of the pile. It proves sequels don't always have to offer more of the same, and action films don't need to be mindless to be great.

YOUR LIFE

'Southern belle' copes with cold Midwestern weather

It was 46 degrees this morning walking to class — and to me, 46 degrees is freezing.

Now that you are laughing at me, let me explain.

Most everyone I have met here grew up in Kansas, Missouri or Colorado and know what cold is. I see them walking outside in shorts and a T-shirt for much of the year.

But you see, I'm from the South. I was born in Placentia, Calif., which is close to Anaheim. I lived in Portland, Ore., for two years then moved back to Orange County, California.

When I was 11, I moved to Atlanta, and now I live in San Antonio, Texas.

If you haven't noticed, I lived only a couple years north of the Mason-Dixon Line. So as a courtesy to you, here is your southern weather report:

Most everyone watches some sort of show based in California — whether it is "Laguna Beach," "The Hills," "The O.C." or almost anything on MTV. They give you a good idea of what the weather is like in SoCal.

Oregon had snow, but I was four years old and stayed inside most of the time. When I was outside, my mom dressed my sister and me in matching snowsuits.

Atlanta had its snowy days, but Northerners wouldn't even consider these to be true snow days. Schools were canceled if there was a chance of ice on the road and flurries in the air. The temperature never really got below 30 degrees.

San Antonio is even better, because it never gets below 70 degrees during a "winter day." We are always in shorts, and during the night when it cools, you wear pants and a North Face jacket.

But in Manhattan, while everyone else is wearing shorts, I am bundled in two pairs of pants, Uggs boots, a turtleneck sweater, two jackets and a scarf — sometimes, I will throw on a hat. I look like a freak. I get laughs, but I am slowly starting to learn to suck it up and shed some layers.

The best part is, after everyone laughs, they give me with a deeply, concerned expression and simply say, "It's not even winter yet!"

What does that mean for this Southern belle? All I can do is stock up on food, blankets and find a good friend to videotape all my classes. That way, when winter comes along, I can stay in my room as much as possible, watching my lectures and warming my hands by my little candle warmer.

Athletes deserve more than tuition

Another headline has surfaced tying former Southern California running back Reggie Bush to receiving monetary bonuses while he was in college.

According to an Oct. 10 article on sports.yahoo.com, two sources told the media outlet that Bush and his family allegedly received almost $280,000 in benefits. The accuser is Lloyd Lake, one of the financiers of failed marketing company New Era Sports & Entertainment. Lake said he has financial documents and other evidence proving Bush's guilt.

Lake probably doesn't care too much about NCAA standards. He's probably looking for a large settlement from Bush.

If the new evidence has substance, the NCAA will continue its investigation of Bush and USC.

Bush could be stripped of his Heisman Trophy, and USC could face disciplinary action.

But what would it be like if these rules weren't in place?

The idea of rewriting the NCAA rule book probably seems far-fetched, but stick with me on this.

All traditional NCAA brainwashing aside, why not pay Reggie Bush and other great collegiate athletes for their services? Don't they deserve to be paid more than the scholarship money they receive?

While I'm glad my tuition isn't going toward Michael Beasley's paycheck, it still seems like these athletes deserve some sort of compensation.

K-State's athletic programs stand to make big financial gains because Beasley is wearing purple. If K-State makes it to the Final Four, the university would receive a hefty paycheck, not to mention the intangible benefits.

Some might argue Beasley and other college athletes should not be paid because many will make millions of dollars as pros. Others might argue he is getting a free education, and he shouldn't need anything else.

But the numbers just don't add up. If the NBA thinks Beasley is worth a few million, surely he must be worth a similar amount to K-State. People still wonder why athletes flee college for professional teams. The NCAA and universities are doing a disservice to top-shelf athletes. Sure, all the unknown athletes love the NCAA. They have a scholarship from their school and no sports reporters calling their cell phones at 3 a.m.

But are some athletes worth more to their schools than their scholarship money?

Any great economics professor would tell you the NCAA is a cartel. Because players don't get paid, universities can keep their ticket prices low and keep fans happy in the process. As long as the NCAA has college athletes handcuffed, Bush and others will continue looking elsewhere for their monetary desires. I don't blame them.

Man behind the madness

Martin reflects on what he has learned, upcoming season

The K-State men's basketball team is loaded with more talent than it has seen in years. Tonight will be the first chance to see just how good players like Michael Beasley and Bill Walker can be together. Coach Frank Martin talked to the Collegian about recruiting and Madness in Manhattan.

MADNESS IN MANHATTAN

What: Introduction of men's and women's basketball teams, dunk contest, scrimmage, comments from coach Frank Martin
Where: Bramlage Coliseum
When: Doors open at 10:30 p.m. tonight

What is it like to see your name next to the head title at a Division I school?

It's a dream come true. I've spent a lot of time waiting for this opportunity. Every once in a while I just sit back and realize that opportunity has come. All that tells me is that I have to work harder than I ever have to meet the standards that is expected at this great school.

When you were coaching in high school down in Miami, did you ever think you would be a Division I coach in Kansas?

I don't know. When you decide to get in this profession, you got to understand you don't know where you're going to end up at. You don't know what opportunity will open up later. Did I ever sit around and say, "Heck, I'm looking to be in Kansas somewhere in my career." I never thought about it that way, but I did expect to go somewhere other than South Florida to continue my career.

What style should we expect to see out of your team this year?

Pressure. We are going to pressure people defensively, and we're going to pressure people offensively. High-energy, passionate players that are going to go out there and compete at a high level and compete at the level you have to compete to win a Big 12 Championship.

What are some of the things coach Bob Huggins instilled in you while you coached with him?

Confidence that you prepared and you do your job and work that you can win. His approach to work every day. He demanded that players come in and compete everyday and take pride in what school they're representing. Being around him, all it did is reinforce that those are the things that I believe in at the high-school level and that the same things are believed in at the college level.

On any level, who is the best player you have ever coached?

Douglas Edwards was probably the most talented player. He was, I believe, the 13th or 14th pick in the NBA Draft in 1993. I have been around a bunch of them: Jason Maxiell (Detroit Pistons), Steven Blake (Denver Nuggets), Udonis Haslem (Miami Heat) and Jose Juan Barea, who we recruited and coached at Northeastern. He is with the Dallas Mavericks right now. All those guys are unbelievable and extremely talented.

Everyone is talking about Michael Beasley, but what other newcomer do you think will have a big impact on this year's team?

A: I think it is more a collective deal. I don't know if it is going to be Michael Beasley or any other of the first-year guys. We've got a nucleus of guys that are in their first year here that all believe in one another, that developed strong relationships, and they come in and compete at a high level, which is what you look for from your players so you can succeed. Especially in a situation like us that we have so many first-year guys, it's always good to see that they're all moving in the right direction.

What is your favorite thing about Manhattan?

People. It is just an incredible community. It's a pleasure to be around so many good people. People that just are so thankful for what we do and so thankful for our basketball program and just so willing — all of us feel at home.

Is that one of your biggest selling points to recruits?

Absolutely. When we get guys on campus and expose them to what the people are all about, they leave and they just love it. It's a huge deal. It's a huge deal 'cause when you're 18 years old and you're thinking about going to college, you want to go somewhere where people want to care for you, and I don't think there is too many places where people care for the student athletes that represent their school as much as people here care for our guys.

Speaking of fans, what do you expect out of them this year? Do you expect them to show up as much as last year?

They better. They better. I mean, what they did for us last year was unbelievable. We have plans on playing harder, playing better and playing longer into the season. I expect them to be better, stronger, louder and more powerful than what they were last year.

So who is your prediction for who is going to win the dunk contest at Madness in Manhattan?

I really don't know. I don't spend a lot of time paying attention to the dunkers. Guys who are playing at this level and at this school should all be able to go up there and dunk different ways. I really don't know. I'm sure that one of those freshmen will go in there and do something since they are so young and energetic. The older guys are happy for the event and want to be there and see the fans, but the older guys want to get rolling and play those games.

How big of a help is Jon Wefald for the program?

The best. When you got a president like him there's no surprise that you have a university that prospers as much as this one does. He's an unbelievable leader and a tremendous resource as a person for everyone that is part of this university.

Wildcats look to avoid slump after off day

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After getting some much-needed rest with an off day Wednesday, the K-State volleyball team gets back to action Saturday when the Wildcats travel to Iowa State.

Coach Suzie Fritz said the extra rest will help the Wildcats avoid falling into a slump after back-to-back losses.

"I think we are trying to combat fatigue at this point in the year, and the October slump that can sometimes consume teams," Fritz said. "We were able to get a little rest, which is important, and we were also able to really focus on and identify things and have some training time."

The past two matches could be enough to shake the confidence of some teams. K-State was swept by Nebraska and then lost 3-2 to Texas in a match that could have gone their way.

"I know our team understands the caliber of the teams we were playing," Fritz said. "I talked to the captains about, 'Are we rattled? Are we shaken, or do we still feel good about the kind of team we think we can be?' Their answer was 'No, we had every opportunity to win that Texas match.'"

The confidence booster for the Wildcats was the way they played at various times in the matches.

"We didn't play well at Nebraska for two out of three games, so I think they feel like after that Texas loss, although we didn't win the match, we did play well at times during the match," Fritz said. "I think they have taken some confidence from that."

Fritz said the best teams in the Big 12 Conference are the ones that can win on the road, and the Wildcats will get a chance to do just that when they travel to Iowa State.

Cross-country captain returns for pre-NCAA championship

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Junior Colin Swaney is hoping to start making up for lost time this weekend.

Swaney, a captain on the cross-country team from Iowa City, Iowa, has been sidelined since the early part of summer with a knee injury. After several months of rehabilitation, Swaney was able to begin training for competition four weeks ago. He will run this weekend with the rest of the Wildcats at the Pre-NCAA Championships on Saturday in Terre Haute, Ind.

"I miss going to meets, hanging out and competing," Swaney said. "It feels like something's missing when you aren't out there competing."

Swaney said he thinks he has been training well and trying to provide leadership for younger runners since coming back from his injury.

"I try to lead by example," he said. "I think I do a pretty good job of that. I'm not perfect, but I try to show people how to do things. This is what you need to do to be serious. Hopefully they can follow that and do bet-

Two weeks ago, K-State competed at the Roy Griak Invitational, which was described by coach Michael Smith as a step up in competition. This weekend, Smith said the competition will be even stiffer.

"It will be very competitive," he said. "There will be a lot of good runners there. We view this weekend through mid-November as the championship season. During that time, I think we want to focus more on performance and less on work on a day-to-day basis. Our performances should start to catch up with the level of work they've been doing."

The Wildcats will face 79 other teams in Indiana this weekend. There also will be several Big 12 Conference teams at the initiations, including Baylor, Colorado, Iowa State, Kansas, Nebraska and Oklahoma State. Smith said approximately a quarter of the teams K-State will face are ranked nationally.

Equestrian team to face Baylor at home

The K-State equestrian team will face Baylor today in a head-to-head competition at Fox Creek Farm beginning at 10 a.m.

"The entire team is looking forward to our home opener this weekend against Baylor," English head coach Ashley Foster said. "Last week the Hunter Seat team was incredibly strong in all of our practices. We plan to carry that focus through this week to pull out a win against Former columnist claims Collegian editor censored content

By Adrienne DeWeese
and Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A former Collegian columnist is speaking out against an editorial decision to not run his weekly column Wednesday.

Chuck Armstrong, senior in electronic media production, has claimed the Collegian censored him and violated his First Amendment rights of free speech and expression.

Alex Peak, Collegian editor in chief, said the column was unprofessional and was not worthy of publication even after immediate edits.

Armstrong was fired Wednesday night after he posted statements on his blog that Peak interpreted as threatening.

AN EDITORIAL DECISION

Brett King, Collegian opinion editor, said he received Armstrong's column Sunday night and placed it in the paper's copy chain either Sunday night or Monday morning.

"I presumed everything was fine with it," said King, senior in political science.

Armstrong said he received a call from King on Tuesday night about his weekly column. Armstrong said King was upset that the column was threatened to be pulled, and the two met to rework several sentences.

Shortly after the changes were made, Armstrong said he received another call saying that his column would not run.

"Even if I had decided to rework it, it would not run that Wednesday," Armstrong said.

Peak, senior in print journalism and advertising, said she gave Armstrong ample opportunity to rework the story and improve his editorial.

"I even talked to him when we were done, and I said, 'Why don't you think about this for a day or two and just come up with more support for your argument?' — not necessarily that he had to change his opinion," Peak said. "I just wanted him to be ready to defend his point."

About 1,000 copies of Armstrong's original, unedited column were passed out at the K-State Student Union, he said.

K-State College Republicans also sponsored a booth in the Union to show support for Armstrong's right to have the editorial published.

"I don't necessarily believe in the what the article says, but I definitely believe that he should have a chance to write his opinion for the paper," said Chris Kovarik, College Republicans vice president and senior in management.

The College Republicans also wrote several messages in chalk throughout campus. Several messages said "Collegian = censorship" and "The Collegian hates free speech."

About 100 people signed a petition in support of Armstrong's stance, which Armstrong said only supports his freedom to express his opinion. As of Thursday night, Armstrong said the petition's future intent was undecided.

Todd Simon, professor of journalism and mass communications, said censorship is not the proper term for the situation.

"The rule on censorship is real easy," Simon said. "It's not censorship unless (speech) is regulated by a government official."

Armstrong, who served as a Collegian columnist for more than two semesters, said he has not considered reapplying as a columnist next semester.

Armstrong, who is KSDB-FM 91.9 program director, said he plans to dedicate his 1-1/2 hour radio show "The Right Track" on Monday about the Collegian and his dismissal. He said the radio station, its advisory council, K-State and the Kansas Board of Regents do not endorse Armstrong's talk show or his opinions.

THE BLOG POST

After learning his column would not run Wednesday, Armstrong posted his original column on his blog and Facebook.com page, along with additional comments about the situation.

Armstrong said he made the post "in the heat of the moment" after he learned his column would not run on Wednesday.

The post, Peak said, included a statement that Armstrong wanted to "bury" the Collegian editor in chief.

"I was frustrated beyond belief, so I went home to do that," Armstrong said. "It was a tad irresponsible on my part to use that phrase and put that link on my blog — hindsight is 20-20."

Peak said she was concerned by the post because it also contained a link to her contact information on the K-State Web site.

"If you clicked on it, it would go straight to my contact information on the K-State People Directory, and that scared me, even knowing that he put that on his blog," she said. "And the fact he said he was going to bury me, I didn't know how to take it."

Peak also said she considered Armstrong's behavior unprofessional and threatening.

"I don't feel like this was something I wanted to show any tolerance for, and just as a human being, I don't think I should have had to deal with it," she said.

With the language in his blog posting, Armstrong said he had no intentions of physical harm.

"I have sincerely apologized to Alex Peak and a few other individuals who found the posting offensive, but I am not backing down from what I am standing up for or from this cause," Armstrong said.

THE EDITOR'S ROLE

Angela Powers, A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications director, said it is an editor in chief's job to choose which articles can run and which cannot.

"(Peak's) responsible, and she has the final say," Powers said. "Nobody is telling her what to do, including her staff. They don't have the right to do that. It's not a free-speech issue."

Armstrong said he acknowledges that the editor in chief of an independent newspaper like the Collegian has rights to control the paper's content.

"I also realize the editor in chief does not do whatever she wants to — everybody knows that," he said. "With that, she had every right to pull my column. I do not feel it was justified with good enough reasons presented to me, and that it was, in fact, a violation of my First Amendment rights."

Peak said she made the decision not to run the original column because it was not balanced and was not a stance she wanted to endorse.

Peak did mention several other Collegian columns lack balance, but that is something she will emphasize in the future.

"Not every column is as balanced as we want it to be, and I don't want to make it look like we are making an example of Chuck," she said. "I just didn't think it was appropriate, and I just didn't see it as something that was ready to run."

Linda Puntney, Student Publications Inc. director, said the Collegian's editorial staff exercises its complete independence in selecting the paper's content.

"I support the editor's right to make an editorial decision, and I don't need to know anything else," she said. "If she wants to make an editorial decision, she has that right to do it and then, I suppose, live with the consequences of making that decision, as we all have to do."

Collegian adviser Kimetris Baltrip said newspaper editors at any level work as gatekeepers and control the flow of information that is disseminated to the newspaper.

"Ultimately, if they think that the quality is not up to the standards of that news organization, they have the right to pull that particular story or to kill it," said Baltrip, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications. "It's not considered censorship. At some point, newspapers have to consider what their identity is."

Union funding structure. Wagner said the Union has ended each year with a significant deficit for the past five years.

"We are taking a look at the financial records and finding ways in which we can help improve our Union through other means," Wagner said.

Nick Piper added the senate is not attacking the Union but just reviewing ways to improve its financial handlings.

"This bill is also not an attack on the Union's leadership as well as for how its been run over the past four or five years," Piper said.

"There are no negative assumptions toward the Union leadership."

Senate also approved Mishal Al-Hawwas and Mohammad Al-Mutawa as members of the Diversity Programming Committee, and also approved travel and promotion allocations for the Saudi Club.

PANEL | Kansas works to improve system

The juvenile justice facilities cause more problems, he said, and to help solve the problem of kids in prison, communities should focus more on the early stages, by funding and getting resources for better education, instead of putting resources into disciplinary systems.

"It starts in the school, not only the school policies, but also the lack of investment in schools," he said.

The final speaker on the panel, Travis Linnemann, graduate student in sociology, focusing on the juvenile justice system, discussed the progressive measures Kansas has taken to improve justice systems.

He said Kansas has taken several steps, such as passing a bill that requires a drug treatment program, that mandates a community treatment program before drug-related offenders are eligible to be sent to prison.

Also, he said another bill is designed to reduce the number of people sent back to prison, also using community based treatment.

"I think we could be applauded a little bit in Kansas for taking some progressive measures to deal with a huge problem."

FLU | Nasal spray has 'host response' in body

Chapes said using the nasal mist might generate a more natural "host response" than having the vaccine injected.

He explained that the body's immune response to a pathogen depends on how it was exposed to that pathogen. For example, if a patient gets infected through a wound on their skin, the pathogen would circulate through their bloodstream and reach their lymph nodes. Those lymph nodes would produce antibodies to resist the germ, according to Chapes.

"With the flu, the respiratory tract is the natural route of infection," he said.

If a person inhales flu germs, tissues surrounding the lungs create antibodies that affect pathogens in the lungs, he said.

"The route of exposure makes a big difference in the level of protection," he said. "The host response is very important, and how you respond is very important."

Lord said a flu clinic representative will be in the lobby to receive guests and notify the doctors. When a doctor is ready, patients walk back to the allergy and immunization room and receive their shot.

To monitor patients for side effects, doctors recommend a 20-minute waiting period right after being vaccinated.

"They want to make sure you're OK and not stumbling off somewhere," Lord said, adding that vaccine side effects are very rare and usually minor.

Health officials from Lafene also will administer flu shots during an annual health fair in the K-State Student Union Oct. 24, Lord said.

teams — you know, finding ways to win in other environments," Fritz said. "This will be a very difficult challenge. Iowa State is about where we are at this point in the league standings."

At this juncture of the season, the Wildcats are looking to become a more well-rounded team. Fritz said her team is good defensively and will devote most of its training to offense.

"This is a good serving team, so by nature a good serving team is going to be a defensive team," Fritz said. "Undoubtedly we have to dig more balls, but we are also a pretty capable blocking team. I think we are a better defensive team than we are an offensive team."

WILL KANSAS STAND UP FOR CLEAN ENERGY?

IT'S EITHER CLEAN AIR OR MORE POLLUTION

Seven coal-fired plants in Kansas are plenty. Our state is already 45% above the national average for carbon dioxide per person. Carbon dioxide is the ozone-causing, climate-changing pollutant behind global warming.

A whopping 75% of our electricity comes from coal. And so why would we consider raising that level?

WE ONLY GET 15% OF THE POWER, BUT KEEP 100% OF THE POLLUTION

The proposed 1400-MW coal-fired power plant at Holcomb would be one of the largest ever built in the U.S. The resulting 10 million tons of carbon dioxide this plant would produce each year would intensify the toll on public health and further damage our environment. That's on top of the estimated $3.5 billion cost to build the plant, which is almost certainly understated. Future taxes on carbon and other coal pollutants could drive the price up even higher.

The irony is, Kansans don't need that much extra electricity. Almost all of the power generated would be sold out of state. We'd just keep all the pollution.

COAL POLLUTION HARMS PUBLIC HEALTH

Beyond just carbon, other coal pollutants include mercury and particulates, as well as acid rain-causing sulfur and nitrogen oxide. It's hard to believe, but coal-fired plants actually emit 60 such pollutants, toxins and carcinogens.

It's a fact: Breathing bad air cuts lives short and burdens even unborn children with health consequences they must manage their entire lives - at great expense.

CLEAN NATURAL GAS + WIND POWER

Clean-burning, domestically-produced natural gas cuts carbon emissions in half.

It emits no mercury and no particulates. Natural gas is abundant, affordable and American. Add wind power (we're #3 in the U.S. for wind resources) and we can meet our power needs in Kansas and protect our environment - now and for future generations.

RUNNING IT BACK

After a record-setting season in 2006, K-State's special teams continues to be a strength this year. Led by a punt return team that ranks No. 1 in the nation, the Wildcats are racking up the yards — and the points — while giving their opponents plenty to prepare for.

OFF THE FIELD | WIDE RECEIVER DEON MURPHY

Deon Murphy has made some noise on the football field this season, but he also can be pretty entertaining off of it. The junior-college transfer from Coffeyville (Kan.) Community College has been dubbed "Pierre" by his teammates because they think he looks like a Frenchman. His French looks might be in question, but Murphy said France is the one place in the world he'd most like to visit. Murphy recently took some time to sit down for this week's Off the Field segment.

So we all know you like acting. What actor are you most like?

I'd say Mike Epps. We kind of got the same style. And Martin — Martin Lawrence. Those two are my favorites. Everybody says I look like Mike Epps, but we aren't even gonna go there.

I heard you talking about how you like soap operas. Would you ever want to act in one?

Acting in anything, not just soap operas. Movies, plays, whatever. That's just me, that's just my character.

Do you watch soap operas?

Yeah, I watch them a lot. I watched them at home right before I came down here this summer.

Which one is your favorite?

"The Young and the Restless." That's everybody's favorite.

What type of character would you want to play?

The funny man, 24/7. I'd have to be the funny man. There isn't anything that'd be more exciting than being the funny man.

So would you ever want to be a TV analyst?

Yeah, I could see that if football don't work out. My major is communications. I think I could do broadcasting, analysts, interviewing — like you're doing with me right now.

How does Manhattan compare to Coffeyville?

It don't compare to Coffeyville. It's way bigger than Coffeyville, and there's more things to do than in Coffeyville. I enjoy Manhattan more. Sometimes I enjoy Manhattan more than Texas, but it's never gonna get that close.

Do you have any pet peeves?

My biggest pet peeve is probably something that deals with women. It doesn't have anything to do with football. If it had to deal with football, it's somebody that's trying to teach me my position that never played my position.

What about off the field, though, something that deals with women?

When somebody tries to demand, tell me exactly what to do. I just don't like that. It's a 50/50 relationship. It's about respect.

What place in the world would you most like to visit?

I think France.

Is that because of your nicknames ("Pierre" and "Frenchie")?

Yeah. No, not even that. It just seems like one of those nice spots to visit. I wouldn't want to go to just any part of France. I'd probably say ... Paris.

Have you ever been to Europe?

No. That side of the world, I've never been. I want to go, man.

So France. Just because of how romantic it is?

It kind of is. It's somewhere you want to take your wife or your girlfriend. Something like that. Anybody can go on a cruise. It's one of those places I can visit ... That's somewhere I want to go, the nice part. Nice restaurants, nice hotels, all that.

So where's your favorite place that you have been? You ever been out of the country?

Not out of the country, but inside the country I think it was probably Atlanta. That's probably my favorite spot.

Why's that?

The women, man. The women. I can say that because I'm single. But they got nice women. It's like a tourist city. I enjoy going to the airports. I like the airport out there. But I like all airports because that's where the women are at.

Airports are where you meet women?

Yeah, especially in Atlanta, L.A., all that. I just enjoy Atlanta because it's a nice city — a nice tourist city. Six Flags is out there. You got a lot of things you can do out there. You can enjoy yourself. There's a lot of celebrities out there. I'm telling you, a lot of the celebrities in Atlanta are just like we live out here. You see them a lot out there, too.

KANSAS STATE

COLORADO

OFFENSE

Despite being sacked only two times last week, Josh Freeman had little protection in the pocket. The offensive line needs to give Freeman more time to allow the big play to develop downfield. The Wildcats couldn't get anything going on the ground against Kansas (53 yards), but that doesn't mean they can abandon the run. Colorado has a highly ranked defense, so this will be a tough test for the K-State offense.

Led by Demetrius Sumler and Hugh Charles, Colorado's dual running back system should be a good matchup against K-State. The Wildcats allowed 170 yards against a similar Kansas running attack. Sumler and Charles have been the most consistent weapons for the Buffaloes, combining for 650 yards and six touchdowns. K-State has 18 sacks and nine interceptions, so the Buffaloes might choose to run more.

DEFENSE

K-State's secondary likely will force some turnovers against Cody Hawkins, who has thrown nine picks. The front seven need to solve their tackling problems quickly to be able to stop the Buffaloes' ground game, which is averaging 135.2 yards per game. They need to finish plays when they have the ball carrier down in the backfield. Hugh Charles has 10 rushes for more than 10 yards this year and is very productive in the open field.

With six interceptions so far, the Colorado secondary is not a huge threat for the big, game-changing play. However, the linebacker corps is the obvious strength of the defense. Jordan Dizon is a disruptive force and leads the Big 12 with 78 tackles. Cornerback Terrence Wheatley — a pre-season All-Big 12 pick — is the leader in the secondary, and he will probably have the tall task of trying to stop K-State's Jordy Nelson.

SPECIAL TEAMS

For the first time, K-State's special teams failed to make any big plays last week. Using the wind to its advantage, Kansas kept the ball away from the Wildcats' returners, utilizing the short punt and four touchbacks. Kicker Kevin Eberhart and punter Matt DiLallo will probably attempt to do the same, keeping the ball out of the hands of K-State's big play return man Deon Murphy.

The Buffaloes seem to have found a replacement for Mason Crosby, who is now kicking for the Green Bay Packers. Kevin Eberhart connected on five field goals against Baylor last week, four of which were from at least 40 yards and his longest was 54 yards. Eberhart has twice been named Big 12 Special Teams Player of the Week, and his threat to score from long range could prove crucial in a tight game.

PREDICTION

With two teams boasting top-25 defenses, this game will be close either way. It will likely be decided by a big play on defense or special teams. It is a late game, so the fans will have a full day to get pumped. K-State is in more of a must-win situation and is playing at home, so the Wildcats will rebound against Colorado in what will be a defensive struggle.

ALORICA INC.

Nelson, Murphy team up to continue punt-return dominance

By Ryne Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Trust is a key component of every football team. Without it, the team would fall apart and the plays would be completely busted. It is important to all phases of the game, but on a certain play it is extremely important.

The punt return.

This play typically consists of a player standing alone almost 40 yards away from his closest teammate with 11 full-grown men bearing down on him and wanting to crush him before he makes his way upfield.

The return unit has one less teammate to help block, so the margin of error is small.

"You got to have a lot of trust in the other guys," said Jordy Nelson, who returned a punt for score against Texas. "We're standing back, looking up into the sky and at the ball while people are running full speed at you."

He has a reason to trust. In the runback at Texas, only one Longhorn got close to making a tackle.

Nelson and Deon Murphy are picking up where former Wildcat Yamon Figs left off. Together they have two punt-return touchdowns - Figs had two in 2006.

Figs finished fifth nationally last year with 14.7 yards per return, but Murphy is challenging that mark. He's sixth in the country with a 19.1-yard average. Nelson is topping both of them with 43 yards per return, but he doesn't have enough returns to qualify for the rankings.

With all the success in Ron Prince's 1 1/2 years with the team, it begs the question: Why have punt returns been so successful since Prince took over?

"The first practice we ever had with him was all special teams practice, and that kind of set the tone there," Nelson said.

If that's the case, the old cliché that practice makes perfect might be true. Nelson's return against Texas was nearly perfect.

"Once you're able to successfully have everyone do their job, then it looks real nice with the wall set up," he said. "If everyone gets their block and makes it clean, it makes (the return) look easy."

Both Nelson and Murphy have had great blocking this year, but there is another quality that every successful punt returner must display.

"No fear, no fear," Murphy said. "Be ready to catch the ball and go. You have to be smart with it."

Last week against Kansas, the Jayhawks were smart by taking the K-State punt-return ability out of the game. They used directional kicks and punt the ball out of bounds to keep the ball out of the playmakers' hands.

It silenced K-State's deadly return team for a week, but one has to wonder how long the playmakers will remain quiet.

Murphy has a perfect punt return in mind.

"Going to the left and going back down the middle or going to the right and going back down the middle," he said. "I love returns like that, where you can have vision and see the gaps and see everything open up for you."

He thinks he'll be able to have one of those returns this year. The problem is he has to be the one who catches it. Nelson is standing back there with him.

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN
Jordy Nelson returns a punt for a touchdown against Texas. After six touchdowns in 2006, K-State's special teams has three already this season.

There isn't a rivalry between the two, but when asked who was the better returner, they both smiled.

"I think I have more experience at punt returner, but having him back there just makes things easier because it is a two-way go," Murphy said. "From what I've seen he's real good at it."

Nelson - in his ever-humble nature - gave the edge to Murphy, but he wasn't ready to say his friend would finish with the better stats.

"I would say Deon because he's faster, he's quicker," he said. "But we'll judge that at the end of the year for a little competition."

K-STATE FOOTBALL BRIEFS

POOR TACKLING A CONCERN

K-State players know they missed out on a golden opportunity to move up in the Top-25 rankings when they lost to Kansas 30-24 last Saturday.

Most concerning about the loss, though, was all those missed tackles.

"That was the biggest thing, the tackling," linebacker Justin Roland said. "We had a bunch of plays in the backfield where we could have got their backs down, and they broke them. It made them look really good as running backs. Really, it was us just missing tackles."

The Jayhawks racked up 437 total yards - 170 of them coming on the ground - and converted 6 of 14 third downs.

The Wildcats must recover quickly. They'll face

Colorado's Hugh Charles this week, a running back who is starting to make a name for himself in the Big 12 Conference.

Charles has 364 yards rushing and a pair of touchdowns in five games.

It's safe to say K-State is eager to take out its frustration on somebody.

"Right now I got a bad taste in my mouth," Roland said. "I can't get the plays that we missed out of my head."

"The sooner that we get to the next game, I think the better."

LATE STARTS AFFECT PLAYERS

Jordy Nelson has had no problem getting up for K-State's games this season, as he leads the team in both receptions (52) and yards (634).

But with all these late start times - this week's game against Colorado got moved to 8:15 p.m. and will be televised on ESPN2 - the bigger problem might be staying awake.

"Yeah, 8:15's almost my bedtime," Nelson said. "I might have to have a little nap time. We'll have all day to rest up ... but we can't lay around too much, because then you'll get tired for the night game."

Sleeping habits aside, Nelson said he understands the importance of putting on a good show in front of a national audience.

"Whenever you get to play on TV, you got to take advantage," he said. "Win the game, play well, show people what you can do. It's a good opportunity."

Carney to face former teammates on Saturday against Colorado

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Friends will be foes for Chris Carney.

Carney, a native of Denver and a graduate of Mullen High School, will go up against several familiar faces when K-State takes on Colorado on Saturday at Snyder Family Stadium.

Many of his former Mullen teammates are on Colorado's roster. Among them are cornerback Benjamin Burney, linebacker Shawn Daniels and linebacker Jake Duran. Standout wide receiver Stephone Robinson, another Mullen graduate, also plays for the Buffaloes.

"It's definitely more special since I'm playing against old teammates," Carney said. "It's going to be more fun."

Carney grew up a K-State fan. One of the reasons, he said, was because his cousin, Dyshod Carter, was a former Wildcat cornerback.

"I didn't catch too much flack for being a K-State fan," Carney said. "I had a few teammates go to CU, but it wasn't too bad."

Carney, a sophomore safety, said some of his reasons for coming to K-State were because of the business school and the dedicated fans.

Though some might remember his cousin, Carney is making a name for himself at K-State. He ranks third in the Big 12 Conference in interceptions, with both of them coming last week against Kansas.

In 2006, his freshman season, he saw limited action. He played in three games and logged five tackles and a pass break-up.

Coach Ron Prince said he is encouraged by the progress Carney has made this season.

"I'm real pleased with Chris and how he's been willing to tackle and on the kicking game, doing some good things," Prince said. "Coach (Greg) Burns has done a good job of coaching these guys, and they're responding. When you're back there, it's one of those deals where the ball is in the air, and if you make a play on it — great. If not, it could go the other way."

As a safety, Prince said Carney possesses the "it factor" the position requires.

"To be a safety, you have to have some of that intangible," he said. "You have to have more than just, 'This is my assignment.' You have to understand where your players are on the field and the windows the quarterback could throw the ball through. You have to assess the flight of the ball and understand what your movement or your rotation might cause the quarterback to see and react."

Other players on defense are also pleased with Carney's progress. Linebacker Ian Campbell said though Carney isn't the most vocal person on the field, he makes his presence known in other ways.

"Chris Carney is a very athletic guy," Campbell said. "He's a young guy, and he brings a lot of intensity to the game. I feel like he's going to grow and become a great player for K-State."

Linebacker Reggie Walker agreed.

"He brings us another playmaker," Walker said. "He's stepped up his play since last season. It's good to have him out there."

Carney said despite his Colorado roots, he's always had purple pride.

"I've always been a K-State fan, so my heart's always been here," he said.

KEYS TO VICTORY

1. PUT 'EM ON THEIR HEELS

K-State wide receivers Jordy Nelson and Deon Murphy both have something in common — speed and good hands. Nelson's 68-yard vertical strike against Kansas was his lone touchdown reception of the game. After the game, Murphy was visibly upset about the Wildcats' offensive struggles. If Colorado expects K-State to stick to short routes again, then the Wildcats need to take advantage. When the Buffaloes start over-pursuing, Josh Freeman can throw it deep and spread the field.

2. BRING BACK THE SPARKLE

K-State has recorded three special teams touchdowns this season. None of them came last week against Kansas. The Wildcats are averaging 25.5 yards per punt return and 23.8 yards per kick return. The Buffaloes, meanwhile, have allowed their opponents just 9.6 yards per punt return. Last week, Kansas avoided K-State's punt returners completely, using directional kicks toward the sideline and short punts that were easy to cover. If Colorado doesn't punt away from K-State like Kansas did, Murphy and Nelson should provide a spark for the special teams.

3. CONVERT AND HOLD

Both K-State and Colorado have converted 38 percent of their third downs this season. When the Wildcats have the ball, they will have to avoid All-Big 12 candidate Jordan Dizon. The senior linebacker leads Colorado's defense and has recorded 84 total tackles with seven for losses. Similarly, Colorado likely will avoid the Wildcats' Ian Campbell. He leads K-State with 2.5 sacks. Whichever team wins the third-down battle will likely come away with the victory.

4. HANDLE HAWKINS

Colorado quarterback Cody Hawkins has thrown for 1,457 yards this season, while the Buffaloes' rushers have netted 811 yards. Hawkins already has brought down Oklahoma and Baylor, and he will fight to improve upon his perfect Big 12 Conference record. He is clearly the Buffaloes' offensive leader and can dictate how the game progresses. K-State's defensive line will need to keep the pressure on him to finish on top and can't let him find his rhythm. With his dad coaching on the sideline, the two can be dangerous when they are on the same page.

5. KEEP YOUR CHIN UP

Saturday will tell a lot about the morale of K-State's team. The Wildcats have been inconvenienced by a midseason distraction — an NCAA investigation — and will have to find a way to stay focused. Hopefully for K-State fans, coach Ron Prince has his team mentally prepared for its game. Either way, Colorado is not complaining about what could turn into an advantage.

Many debate about high altitude, how it affects road performance

By Adam Ashmore
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With Colorado's Folsom Field situated 5,360 feet above sea level, the Buffaloes have a mile up on their competition.

However, does the advantage travel with the team?

According to Chris Chilen, Colorado's assistant athletic trainer, the answer is no.

"I feel our true advantage is at home where our team has adapted to the oxygen levels," he said.

The Colorado football team trains in high altitudes, so many think performing closer to sea level — where oxygen is easier to take in — would be less difficult. However, Chilen said training in high altitudes is beneficial, though it is not the most effective form of athletic training.

"The most productive way to train for an athlete is to live in low altitudes and train in high altitudes," Chilen said.

As far as teams traveling to Folsom Field, Chilen said it all depends on how the other teams adjust to the altitude.

"A lot is mental, and the more the body adapts, the more efficient it can become in the high altitude," he said.

The Buffaloes have an extra advantage when teams come into Boulder, Colo., but whether or not their home altitude gives them disadvantages on the road is unclear.

One theory that's been kicked around is the ball flies further in the thin Colorado air. If that's the case, then Colorado kicker Kevin Eberhart would certainly lose distance on his road field goals.

But considering Eberhart kicked a 54-yard field goal last week at Baylor — a long field goal by most standards — this is difficult to measure.

Christopher Sorensen, K-State physics professor, said the altitude should not make a difference on the flight of the ball.

"Air resistance is not dependent on the pressure around it, so the ball should carry the same," he said.

Though the laws of physics do not apply, it is hard to ignore what has been going on with the baseballs hit in Denver by the Colorado Rockies since they became a major league franchise in 1993.

Coors Field, the Rockies' home stadium, has an elevation of 5,200 feet — similar to that of Folsom Field.

The Rockies were so concerned about the altitude that they went as far as getting permission from Major League Baseball officials to store their baseballs in a humidifier. The humidifier creates a more moist baseball, causing it to not travel as far.

The Rockies have seen a steady decrease in home runs since the humidifiers' debut in

The University of Colorado's home stadium — Folsom Field — sits 5,360 feet above sea level. The effect of high altitudes have been seen as an advantage for Colorado's sports teams.

Given these statistics, perhaps there is something to the notion that Eberhart's kicks also can be affected by the altitude.

Sorensen said it would be interesting to experiment with the phenomenon.

"I cannot make any conclusions without doing any experiments myself," he said.

CU MEDIA RELATIONS

Colorado quarterback Cody Hawkins is off to a good start in his redshirt freshman season. Hawkins, whose dad is coach Dan Hawkins, has 1,457 yards and 10 touchdowns this season.

Father-son duo at Colorado keep focus on football, not relationship

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some kids want to get away from their parents when they go off to college. Others want to play football for their dad.

Well, at least that's what Colorado quarterback Cody Hawkins did when he signed to play for his father, coach Dan Hawkins.

"I love it," Cody said. "I wouldn't change anything about it. I think it's awesome that I get to spend as much quality time with my dad as I do."

Cody was nearly sold on going to Boise State, where his father was coach before he left for Colorado in 2006. At the last minute, however, he had a change of heart. He surprised his father by signing with the Buffaloes, putting the exclamation point on Dan's first recruiting class.

"It was definitely tough to leave the town that I grew up in," Cody said. "That was easily the toughest decision I have ever made in my life. When it came down to it, I couldn't pass up playing in the Big 12."

Cody, a highly touted recruit, went undefeated from sixth grade through the time he graduated high school. His only drawback was his height. He stands at just 5 feet, 11 inches.

After redshirting his freshman season, Cody competed for the starting quarterback job this year. He beat out Bernard Jackson — fair and square — and has started since opening day.

The fact that the coach and quarterback are father and son has not overshadowed the success the Buffaloes have had so far. Maybe that's because Dan treats Cody like just another player.

"I tell people all the time I don't really look at him necessarily as my son," Dan said. "I don't look out there and go, 'Hey, that's my kid! We're trying to move the football and score some points and win some games."

It could be that type of relationship that has helped Cody get off to a fast start in the Big 12 this year.

He and his father keep things strictly business-like when it comes to football.

"I think it is very different than people think," Cody said. "I came to Colorado for one reason — to win football games — and I'm not going to do that if I'm having to get Christmas presents or asking for allowance from him in the office."

No, there aren't any free passes on the field for Cody. He gets the same treatment as any other player who makes a mistake.

"I think he's thrown the same amount of interceptions as he has touchdowns, and that's not good," Dan said. "Our pass efficiency rating is not great, so clearly there's some things that have to improve there."

"I keep telling him he doesn't get a mulligan in football. He needs to not throw those picks. But he's done an OK job so far."

Still, if father and son need to have a non-football conversation, there is always a time and place for it.

"We talk about other things, and if he wants to bring something up, that's fine," Dan said. "But when we're here, we're doing mostly football."

Ben Harkins, sophomore in professional secondary education, was working security near the bins and said he saw a lot of people donating.

"This program emphasizes the positive role of the university in our community," Harkins said. "It shows that K-State is about helping people."

In September, students in the Intro to Leadership Concepts class went door to door collecting donations from Manhattan residents.

Students were divided into groups of 10 and were assigned different neighborhoods around the Manhattan area, said Chance Lee, senior in sociology and leader of two groups.

"Overall, people were really friendly," Lee said. "They were happy to see us and were very serious about the contributions they were making."

Lee's groups gathered 366 pounds of food, and the Leadership Studies students gathered a total of 11,000 pounds, he said.

"It shows how students can make a big difference with a little work — a huge impact with just a little effort," Lee said.

letes asked for donations during the game, and together with the efforts of the leadership students, gathered 14,155 pounds of food, Shields said. She said this year's campaign donations will be weighed and counted on Monday.

This is the second year the Intro to Leadership Concepts class has incorporated its annual food drive with the Cats for Cans program, said Mike Finnegan, instructor of educational leadership.

Each year, the number of donations has grown. In 2004 students collected more than 1,700 pounds. The number rose to 3,500 pounds in 2005 and to 6,500 pounds in 2006, Finnegan said.

It is a good opportunity for students to get involved in their communities and to help those who are in need, Finnegan said.

"It is important for students to help the cause to eliminate hunger in our community," he said.

Rice part of Nobel Prize-winning group

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State professor of agronomy served on a U.N. committee that will share the 2007 Nobel Peace Prize.

Charles Rice, professor of agronomy, said he learned through congratulatory e-mails Friday that the U.N. Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change and former U.S. Vice President Al Gore will share the Nobel Peace Prize for their efforts to raise awareness about global warming.

"I wasn't expecting it at all," Rice said. "I hadn't even paid attention to who was considered in the running. I had heard a rumor that Al Gore was being considered but nothing about the IPCC."

Rice served a three-year appointment to the IPCC, which was organized into three working groups. Working Group I examined the science of climate change, including human and natural causes for climate change, Rice said.

Working Group II looked at different economic adaptations like agriculture, transportation, human health and natural ecosystems. The group's scientists studied the expected effects and how people in different regions would adapt to climate changes, Rice said.

Working Group III examined mitigation, including ways to help reduce the effect of climate changes and reduction of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases. Rice said he served as one of 10 lead authors of the agriculture chapter in Working Group III, which included more than 100 scientists.

"We basically volunteer our time to do this scientific review of the science on mitigation and climate change," Rice said.

More than 2,000 scientists contributed to the three working groups, which included lead and contributing authors and reviewers, Rice said.

Rice said he does not plan to attend the Nobel Peace Prize award ceremony Dec. 10 in Oslo, Norway.

Blood drive successful

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's campus-wide blood drive exceeded its goal by four pints last week.

With a goal of 680 pints of blood between two donation sites, the blood drive received 684 productive pints of blood, said Kristi Ingalls, donor recruitment representative for the Central Plains American Red Cross.

During fall blood drives, Ingalls said the Red Cross always exceeds its goal. The Red Cross has contracts with more than 100 hospitals in Kansas and northern Oklahoma, and their needs determine each blood-drive goal, she said.

Though the drive met its goal, Ingalls said the Red Cross usually collects 60 pints more than the weekly total goal during the fall-semester drive.

"We're still really happy that we met our goal," she said. "That's what we're there to do, so we were really excited."

More than 830 people donated during the blood drive, which ran Tuesday through Friday at the K-State Student Union Ballroom and Putnam Hall lobby. More than 260 people also donated blood for the first time, Ingalls said.

A blood shortage usually occurs during the summer and winter holiday seasons, Ingalls said. She also said a summer shortage has carried into the fall season because of factors like a shrinking donor pool, medical advances, an aging population and busy farmers.

"Right now, corn and milo are in season for harvesting, and a lot of the farmers can't get out of the field," Ingalls said. "It's been a good season for them, but that great harvest hurts us since they aren't able to donate blood."

"We have blood drives in every town in Kansas. Those rural communities really get hit from the harvest, and they can't come in and donate, so we definitely see a big effect from that."

For students and faculty members who missed last week's drive, Ingalls said they can participate in the Manhattan blood drive Oct. 25-26. Another campus-wide blood drive will take place in April.

Ingalls said students and faculty members can call (800) GIVE-LIFE for a donation site if they are interested in donating at any time. Those who are unable to donate because of low iron count or other factors can serve as volunteers at future blood drives, she said.

"Our volunteers are just as important as our donors," Ingalls said. "If we don't have them, we can't have a successful drive."

Athletes collect pre-game donations for Cats for Cans

Student athletes pushed shopping carts around the Snyder Family Stadium parking lot and collected non-perishable food items and cash from fans Saturday before the K-State, University of Colorado football game.

The tailgaters contributed to the Cats for Cans campaign, which was sponsored by the Flint Hills Breadbasket. With the slogan, "Because no one should go hungry," the Breadbasket's mission is to collect and distribute food to families in need. The Cats for Cans campaign has been going on for 20 years, according to the group's Web site, breadbasket.manhattankans.org.

Jill Shields, associate director of student services for athletics, was in charge of one of the donation drop-off points along with countless students who were located at each of the four donation bins spread across the east entrance, she said. The students informed fans from both teams about the program and encouraged them to contribute.

"We also received many donations from the Colorado fans," she said. "We have been having great contributions."

Ben Harkins, sophomore in pre-professional secondary education, was working security near one of the bins and said he saw a lot of people donating.

"This program emphasizes the positive role of the university in our community," Harkins said. "It shows that K-State is about helping people."

In September, students in the Intro to Leadership Concepts class went door to door collecting donations from Manhattan residents.

Students were divided into groups of 10 and were assigned a different neighborhood around the Manhattan area, said Chance Lee, senior in sociology and leader of two groups.

"Overall, people were really friendly," Lee said. "They were happy to see us and were very serious about the contributions they were making."

Dam detour will not affect Stampede

By Amanda Keim
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As construction on the Tuttle Creek Dam continues, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has created a detour directing River Pond Park users from U.S. Highway 24 and Kansas Highway 13.

The detour, which went into effect on Oct. 8, will remain until the Tuttle Creek Dam project is completed in 2009 or 2010.

Brian McNulty, operations manager of Tuttle Creek Reservoir, said spoiled material surrounding the area has created an extra burden in the construction process. He said the detour has been created as a safety precaution.

THIS WEEK | A look at events that occurred during this week in history

TODAY 1917: MATA HARI EXECUTED

Mata Hari, the archetype of the seductive female spy, was executed for espionage by a French firing squad at Vincennes outside of Paris.

She first came to Paris in 1905 and found fame as a performer of exotic Asian-inspired dances.

She began touring all over Europe, telling the story of how she was born in a sacred Indian temple and taught ancient dances by a priestess who gave her the name Mata Hari, meaning "eye of the day" in Malay.

In reality, Mata Hari was born in a small town in northern Holland in 1876, and her real name was Margaretha Geertruida Zelle.

TUESDAY 1934: THE LONG MARCH

The embattled Chinese Communists broke through Nationalist enemy lines and began an epic flight from their encircled headquarters in southwest China.

Known as Ch'ang Cheng — the "Long March" — the retreat lasted 368 days and covered 6,000 miles, nearly twice the distance from New York to San Francisco.

Civil war in China between the Nationalists and the Communists broke out in 1927.

WEDNESDAY 1931: CAPONE GOES TO PRISON

On this day in 1931, gangster Al Capone was sentenced to 11 years in prison for tax evasion and fined $80,000, signaling the downfall of one of the most notorious criminals of the 1920s and 1930s.

Alphonse Gabriel Capone was born in Brooklyn, N.Y., in 1899 to Italian immigrants. He was expelled from school at 14, joined a gang and earned his nickname, "Scarface," after being sliced across the cheek during a fight.

By 1920, Capone had moved to Chicago, where he soon was helping to run crime boss Johnny Torrio's illegal enterprises, which included alcohol smuggling, gambling and prostitution.

THURSDAY 1867: U.S. TAKES POSSESSION OF ALASKA

On this day in 1867, the United States formally took possession of Alaska after purchasing the territory from Russia for $7.2 million, or less than 2 cents an acre.

Russia wanted to sell its Alaska territory, which was remote, sparsely populated and difficult to defend, to the United States rather than risk losing it in battle with a rival like Great Britain.

FRIDAY 1781: VICTORY AT YORKTOWN

Hopelessly trapped at Yorktown, Virginia, British Gen. Lord Cornwallis surrendered 8,000 British soldiers and seamen to a larger Franco-American force, effectively bringing an end to the American Revolution.

Lord Cornwallis was one of the most capable British generals of the American Revolution.

In 1776, he drove Gen. George Washington's Patriot forces out of New Jersey, and in 1780 he won a stunning victory over Gen. Horatio Gates' Patriot army at Camden, S.C.

Cornwallis' subsequent invasion of North Carolina was less successful, however, and in April 1781, he led his weary and battered troops toward the Virginia coast, where he could maintain seaborne lines of communication with the large British army of Gen. Henry Clinton in New York City.

Manhattan farmers co-op promotes ethanol gas with sale

By Emily Aldredge
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan residents had the chance to fill up their vehicles with an ethanol-gas mixture for $1.85 a gallon on Friday at the Farmers Cooperative Association station on East Highway 24.

Brandon Walker, Manhattan resident, was one of the first customers to arrive. He said when he discovered the co-op was having a sale on ethanol last Friday, he was excited because it was so close to home.

Walker said when he lived in North Carolina, he drove 30 miles to fill up his car because he did not want normal gasoline.

Since the co-op is on his way to work in Manhattan, Walker said he will never have to drive 30 miles to be an environmentally friendly citizen again.

"I feel if we can grow and produce it here, then it is better than depending on others," Walker said.

Walker was one of many drivers who came to take advantage of the E85 for $1.85 at the co-op. Co-op employees provided hot dogs and drinks from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. to the drivers who were filling up their tanks with the mixture of 85 percent ethanol, 15 percent gasoline. Employees also handed out miniature Indy race cars in honor of the Indy car that uses ethanol instead of regular gasoline.

But not every car can run on an ethanol mixture. Vehicles that can use either an ethanol mixture or gasoline are called flex-fuel vehicles, said Tony Tanking, petroleum coordinator for Farmers Cooperative Association. Many drivers do not realize they are driving a flex-fuel car, he said. Car owners can look up their car's vehicle identification number online to see if their vehicle is ethanol-compatible.

Tanking said he thinks the biggest reason people are not demanding flex-fuel cars from automakers is the ethanol mixture can be difficult to find. He said the co-op is only the 24th station in Kansas to have ethanol available, and Friday's event was an effort to let drivers know they can now find E85 in Manhattan.

"We would love to have as many people as possible come out now that we are here," Tanking said.

Gov. Kathleen Sebelius supports driving flex-fuel cars and using ethanol when possible, Tanking said.

Since ethanol is made from certain harvestable crops, Sue Schulte of the Kansas Corn Commission and the Grain Sorghum Producers Association said she was at the co-op on Friday to help promote the event and to bring the "Corn Car," a Chevrolet that runs on ethanol.

"We obviously do a lot with ethanol because of our interest in the market it creates for corn," she said.

Schulte said corn and sorghum are used to produce ethanol, and the crop industry is growing rapidly as a result of an increased demand for ethanol.

Tanking said he thinks increasing the nation's consumption of ethanol will help make the United States more independent.

"The only way we are going to alleviate our dependence on foreign oil is to do something here," Tanking said.

"Steps like this help us become more self-reliant."

Author, attorney to address privacy issues concerning networking sites

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A nationally recognized attorney and author will address Facebook.com and MySpace.com privacy issues at 7 tonight in the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

C.L. Lindsay III, author of "The College Student's Guide to the Law: Get a Grade Changed, Keep Your Stuff Private, Throw a Police Free Party, and More!", will present "The Dangers of Facebook and MySpace."

Union Program Council is sponsoring the free lecture. Christopher Jones, UPC Forums Committee co-chair, said UPC members heard about Lindsay through his agent and thought his lectures sounded like an interesting topic for students. Lindsay's lecture will address general privacy laws and irresponsible uses of Web sites like Facebook and MySpace, said Jones, sophomore in biochemistry.

"We thought it was a relevant topic because everyone is really cautious with the Internet," Jones said. "Most people don't know the privacy laws and how they apply to online content, so we thought it would be a pretty good way to learn about it."

Lindsay left his New York law practice in 1998 to found the Coalition for Student and Academic Rights. As its executive director, Lindsay has made CO-STAR into a national student-rights organization that helps college students — free of charge — with legal problems, according to CO-STAR's Web site, www.co-star.org.

Lindsay also writes a weekly syndicated column, "Ask CO-STAR," which is distributed on Knight Ridder/Tribune's College Wire Service. He has appeared on national TV and radio shows, and he has been featured in publications like US News & World Report, The Chicago Tribune,

The Washington Post and Newsday.

Students should attend Lindsay's lecture to learn about how to use networking sites responsibly and keep personal information private, said Powell Runyan, Forums Committee co-chair and junior in pre-professional construction science and management.

"With jobs and any organization on campus and the job market, they can go online and find any information," Powell said. "There is a lot of good information (Lindsay)

HIT OR MISS | The editorial board selects Hit or Miss topics and writes them after a majority vote. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

HIT | NOBEL PEACE PRIZE

Charles Rice, professor of agronomy at K-State, was part of the U.N. Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change that won the Nobel Peace Prize with former U.S. Vice President Al Gore. The award helps to solidify K-State's place as one of the best land-grant universities in the country.

MISS | CROWDS AT BASKETBALL, FOOTBALL

The attendance at this year's Madness in Manhattan was significantly less than last year's. Be honest - who would you rather see: Michael Beasley and Bill Walker, or Bob Huggins? Also, there were plenty of seats available in the south endzone and the upper deck at K-State's football game with Colorado. K-State shouldn't be known for fair-weather fans.

HIT | 'STOP KISS'

The Theatre Department's first play of the season, "Stop Kiss," had a great opening weekend. The show, which addresses homosexual relationships, had a cast of seven people, including three freshmen and a cat.

MISS | ORAL ROBERTS PRESIDENT

If the allegations are true, Oral Roberts University President Richard Roberts spent university funds so he and his wife could live a lavish lifestyle. Students, who spend a good chunk of their lives paying back loans for tuition, do not need a president wasting more of their money.

HIT | BLOOPERS AT MADNESS

Showing the bloopers of the K-State men's and women's basketball teams was a good way to display that the players do indeed have a sense of humor. It was also a nice change from last year's Madness.

MISS | POOR SOUND SYSTEMS

The blooper reel at Madness in Manhattan was difficult to enjoy for some because of the poor sound quality at Bramlage Coliseum. Also, despite it being new, the sound system at Snyder Family Stadium has let fans down at times this year.

Final draft Group tries to convince Gore to run again

On Oct. 10, the New York Times ran a full-page advertisement aimed at one man. It was about a man who has been on the national stage for some time, a man who many believe is just what this country needs. But the ad was not sponsored by MoveOn.org, nor was it about Gen. David Petraeus; it was Al Gore.

The group who purchased the ad was none other than Draft Gore, a group that has been trying for years to persuade the former vice president to run for president - again. According to the Oct. 11 edition of the Times, the ad called on Gore to pursue the presidency, not because he won the popular vote in the 2000 election, but because the country and the world needs his leadership.

Gore's leadership and vision on the issue of climate change has led to a Nobel Peace Prize because of the awareness he has brought to the subject. If climate change can be altered for the better, millions of lives could be saved, and Gore will have no small part in it. So why not fly straight from Oslo, Norway, where the award is given, to New Hampshire?

According to The Nation magazine on Oct. 10, the deadline for entering the New Hampshire primary is Nov. 2, which gives Gore plenty of time to reconsider his previous claims that he has no intention of running for president.

Draft Gore is hoping he will. According to the ad in the Times, Draft Gore has collected more than 136,000 signatures asking him to dust off his hat and throw it in the ring.

The reason he is so appealing is because he is a hodgepodge of all the "good qualities" of the current Democratic candidates. He has experience - eight years in the House, eight years in the Senate and eight years as America's No. 2 man - and he has the name recognition all Democratic candidates - except Hillary Clinton - are searching for.

But more importantly, he has the vision a president needs. In September 2002, Gore blasted President Bush for squandering international support for the United States in his pursuit of war in Iraq. Gore said the Iraq war would take our attention away from the war on terrorism and would be more difficult and lengthy than Bush made it out to be, according to USA Today on Sept. 28, 2002. My, how wrong he was.

But besides the experience, the name recognition and the vision, Gore could do something the other Democrats have struggled to do - challenge Hillary Clinton. According to The Nation, Gore was leading Clinton in a Detroit News poll for August. If Democratic voters are unhappy with the "default" candidate, as Barack Obama has called her, Gore offers them the perfect alternative.

Gore was willing to stand up to those denying the existence of climate change and was willing to accept the Supreme Court decision an election. But if he really cares about fighting climate change, what better way to do so than to use the influence of the presidency of the United States? Our country could join the rest of the world in taking steps to combat climate change.

If Gore has no desire to run for or be president, Draft Gore will have wasted $65,000 - yes, the ad cost that much. Who are we to criticize him if he decides to live the rest of his life with an Academy Award, a Nobel Peace Prize and the satisfaction he has bigger priorities than politics as usual? If he does run, we can think of it as a do-over for 2000.

People must follow Gore's lead, address environmental problems

Bombs, guns and hand grenades might be considered the largest threats to national security, but one issue should be at the top of the world's list of concerns: the Earth's fate.

When it comes to environmental policy, no man knows the topic better than Al Gore. It was announced last Friday that the former vice president will receive a Nobel Peace Prize for his efforts, and it is hard to overlook the message of "go green."

According to the U.S. Census Bureau, the world population is expanding at a mind-blowing rate. In the year 1800, the world population reached 1 billion people; by 1922, it was at 2 billion; and by 2000, it was at 6 billion. Yet, by the year 2050, the population is estimated to explode to more than 9 billion people. This means if the world's natural resources were spread evenly, people in 2050 will have only 25 percent of the resources per capita people in 1950 had, according to the Go Green Initiative.

Living in the world as we treat it today, those resources are not likely to exist by that time. With our forests destroyed, ozone layer depleted and species dying at an unprecedented rate, Gore said even with those resources that will be available to us in the future, most of them will be useless, unless we take action and start preserving what we have.

The United States along with the rest of the world, is wasteful. The average American throws away 4.3 pounds of trash a day, topping more than 1,569 pounds a year, according to the Iowa Waste Reduction Center. More waste is accumulated during holidays like Thanksgiving and Christmas, with enough wrapping paper, for example, to cover 45,000 Snyder Family Stadiums. Less than 25 percent of waste is recycled each year.

According to MSNBC News, however, if every family reduced its weekly waste during the holidays by just one pound, 250,000 tons of trash nationwide would be eliminated. "If every household reused just two feet of ribbon each year, the resulting 38,000 miles of ribbon could tie a bow around the Earth. If everyone sent one fewer card, 50,000 cubic yards of paper would be saved," according to MSNBC.

It is like the old saying goes: you should leave things as you find them. Generation X has become couch-potato lazy, and we need to take a stand. We sit behind our iPods, cellular phones and TiVos, disregarding the way we treat our planet - and rarely realizing the effects it will have on our successors.

Though Gore was denied the presidency in 2000, he landed an important secondary role as an activist for environmental efforts around the world. Any monkey-faced person can act as president, but it takes someone with guts to steer the world into an off-centered topic like the environment. Gore and a handful of other activists have illustrated how decimated our world will be if we do not take better care of it.

The fact remains that as generations live and die on this Earth, it will not remain the same. But a conscientious effort to make it better - or at least to treat it better - will provide more resources for our families in the future.

The world has enough to worry about, with war and politics soaking up the concerns of our daily lives. Today's generation can at least address environmental concern and make it less of a concern for others. After all, more people die in natural disasters, and these disasters have a strong influence on factors like economy rather than combat.

Going green might be as appealing as eating your vegetables was when you were little, but it will be good for us. Preventing disasters like hurricanes or biological waste might not be something we can defeat overnight, but we cannot let these issues flood and destroy the precious ground we live on. Like Gore, we need to be proactive.

We need to address the pit of these problems before they become substantially worse. We have a beautiful Earth, and it is our duty to maintain it. If we can improve it, others can continue the blessed tradition of passing along something more glorious than we ever imagined.

Plants easy to care for, make living areas more pleasant

By Brandon Steinert
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Houseplants are a popular way to decorate living spaces, but many people are discouraged by the constant death of their investments.

When the plants die, many owners use the popular excuse that they do not have a green thumb.

That's simply not the case. Kim Williams, professor of horticulture, forestry and recreation resources, said people should not expect houseplants to live forever.

"Because of temperature ranges and low-light intensity, a houseplant is not going to be able to thrive like it would in its native environment, which a lot of times is a tropical environment," Williams said.

Kent Kimmins, associate professor of horticulture, forestry and recreation resources, said there are many benefits to having houseplants; for example, they purify the air.

They also are known for making small living areas more pleasant, especially if you live in a dorm room with cinderblock walls.

"I have at least one or two plants in my room at all times," said Paula Chain, senior in horticulture. "They make rooms more attractive, and I think they're pretty."

Kimmins said growers should have plants that fit their situation.

"Peace Lilies are easy plants to grow," Kimmins said.

He said the white-flowered plants require plenty of water, but they tolerate low light and only need a half-strength dose of fertilizer once a month.

Kimmins said African Violets are also a popular houseplant.

"They grow well under indirect light like a desk lamp," he said. "If the light casts good hard shadows, then it's plenty for African Violets."

Kimmins said the plant survives well in 70-degree temperatures, comes in a wide variety of colors and is fairly inexpensive for a houseplant.

Pothos plants also are easy to care for but slightly more complicated, depending on the variant, he said.

Kimmins said these plants sometimes have a small amount of gold color on the leaves; a plant with more gold color requires more light.

Heart-leafed philodendrons are popular because they are easy to grow, he said.

Philodendron.

Their dark-green color allows them to thrive in low-light situations.

"They are very tough plants," Kimmins said. "If you don't over water them or run them over with a car, then they won't die."

He said it's popular to keep philodendrons in a hanging pot because the leaves hang over the sides.

Snake plants, also known as mother-in-law tongues, favor dry conditions and are tolerant of low-light conditions, Kimmins said.

These plants require only watering once every two weeks.

"Don't over water them, and they'll be fine," Kimmins said.

Students portray characters very well

"Stop Kiss"

Review by Alex Peak

As a life-long fan of live entertainment, shows from the K-State Department of Theatre usually send me home with a sour stomach and foggy mind. Though I admit I rarely have much knowledge of the plays before I see them on stage, I often walk away dumbfounded at whether it was the script, interpretation or acting that went wrong.

However, "Stop Kiss" was a completely different story. The directing, acting, stage presence, props, lighting, music, etc., were all infallible.

Hailey Gillespie, graduate student in theater with an emphasis in drama therapy, plays Callie, a New York traffic reporter, who stumbles upon Sara — a third-grade teacher who recently accepted a job in the Bronx — by way of a friend of a friend who she isn't friends with anymore. Callie catfits for Sara (Lauren Perez, freshman in theater) and befriends the New York rookie, to say the least.

The play begins with a view of Callie's messy New York apartment — newspapers, take-out food, puzzle pieces amuck — and Callie jamming out with her guitar while she's waiting to meet Sara and her cat, Caesar. In complete contrast to Callie's sloppy, eccentric style, Sara is very "together," and conservatively dressed with brown loafers.

Upon first meeting, Callie scrutinizes Sara's decision to move from St. Louis, Mo., to New York to teach at a public school. Though they seem like opposites, Callie and Sara become fast friends.

Throughout the play, there is mention of Sara's previous boyfriend, Peter (Aaron Dodd, junior in theater), and of George (Dillon Artzer, freshman in theater), Callie's on-again, off-again friend with benefits. Though seemingly heterosexual and just companions, the two women develop a sort of tender, innocent love for one another.

The story has an unusual progression as it moves from scene to scene from two different perspectives: Callie and Sara's relationship before the kiss, and the aftermath of the kiss.

In one scene, Callie and Sara are happy, drinking wine and joking. Then the stage lights darken, the set is rearranged, soft guitar music plays, and the pulse of hospital machines beep. In this scene, Sara is lying on a hospital bed, in a coma, with her head bandaged.

Prior to the culmination, Callie and Sara hardly mentioned feelings for each other beyond that of just friendship.

The violence and hatred shown toward them after their first embrace and kiss, which takes place at 4 a.m. on a park bench in the dark, grabs the gut of every audience member.

"Stop Kiss" is well written. Gillespie and Perez portray their characters beautifully. Director Kate Anderson, assistant professor and director of theater, did a fabulous job taking the delicate, controversial subject of homosexuality and staging it on this campus.

T.I. arrested for accepting firearm delivery

Rapper T.I. was arrested in Atlanta on Sunday after he accepted delivery of three machine guns and two silencers.

T.I., whose real name is Clifford Harris, was arrested hours before he was scheduled to appear on the BET Hip-Hop Awards show.

One of Harris' bodyguards was arrested last Wednesday after buying the guns and agreed to assist agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

Harris was arrested in 1998 for breaking the Georgia Controlled Substances Act and was given a seven-year probation sentence for his infractions. It is a federal offense for a convicted felon, like Harris, to have someone else buy weapons for him or her.

Harris is alleged to have a large collection of illegal firearms.

He is set to appear in court on Monday.

K-State's offense explodes to help the Wildcats to 47-20 victory

By Ryne Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

No one knew what to expect from K-State following a sobering loss against Kansas.

The Wildcats didn't look like they remembered last week at all, though, cruising to a 47-20 win over Colorado on Saturday at Snyder Family Stadium.

K-State rolled up 463 yards of offense against a Buffaloes defense that came in surrendering just 308 yards per game. The Wildcats did it in all phases, as quarterback Josh Freeman threw for 214 yards, and the running attack racked up a total of 249 yards and three touchdowns.

Senior running back James Johnson was the workhorse in the running game with 20 carries, 159 yards and two touchdowns.

Johnson started the scoring with 7:29 left in the first quarter with a 5-yard cutback run for a touchdown.

It wasn't the only time Johnson exploited a cut-back lane. Johnson gained most of his yards by letting the defense flow one way and then going the other.

"That was by design," coach Ron Prince said. "James has a real knack for vision and seeing the hole. He's at that point in his career where he now has the body and the stamina to do something with (his vision)."

Johnson was not the only show on offense. Junior wide receiver Deon Murphy got seven touches — four receiving and three rushing — and found the end zone twice.

He gained 37 yards on the ground and showcased his speed on a fake-option reverse that went for a 20-yard touchdown. Freeman took the snap and rolled to his right, showing an option look with Johnson. Freeman pitched the ball, and Murphy — running the opposite way — intercepted the pitch and took it around the left side untouched for the 20-yard score. It put the Wildcats up 17-3.

"It's something we discussed at practice, and it's in the game plan," Murphy said. "I'm surprised we brought it out tonight. It's just one of those things that you know it's going to be a touchdown."

Murphy also gained 47 yards receiving and had a 28-yard touchdown catch that extended the Wildcat lead to 30-13. He flashed some fancy moves after catching the slant pass from Freeman, leaving a defender face-first on the ground as he raced to the end zone.

Special teams got in on the scoring as well, with four field goals from Brooks Rossman and a blocked punt returned for a touchdown.

With the Wildcats up 33-20, the Buffaloes faced fourth-and-11 from their own 15. Punter Matt DiLallo fumbled the snap, then picked it up and tried to punt it. Daniel Gonzalez blocked the punt, and defensive back Courtney Herndon scooped it up for a touchdown.

The day wasn't all sunshine and smiles for the Wildcats, however. K-State gave up a total of 411 yards of offense, and running back Hugh Charles gashed the defense for 171 yards and a touchdown.

"The way we had to play good defense today is not giving up deep plays," Prince said. "That meant we had to give up some yards on the ground, as distasteful as that is."

K-State did force three interceptions and recovered a fumble. The Wildcats also stepped up in the fourth quarter, surrendering just 65 yards. Cornerback Justin McKinney led the defense with 12 tackles.

After a week of turmoil that included the KU loss and reports of possible NCAA violations, the Wildcats didn't let the talk get to them.

"It didn't distract us at all," said senior wide receiver Jordy Nelson, who caught four balls for 93 yards. "We had one meeting, and we went on, and really this is the first time it has come up since."

Madness in Manhattan returns

By Ryne Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There was no Bob Huggins at this year's Madness in Manhattan, but there were a pair of superstar freshmen in Bill Walker and Michael Beasley.

The event might not have been as anticipated this year, but the estimated 7,000 fans in attendance saw the two freshmen walk on the Bramlage Coliseum court for the first time in the 2007-08 season.

The opening video sequence showed two limos driving toward Bramlage Coliseum. The men's and women's teams got out and made their way inside the arena.

Beasley was the first player introduced, and the crowd erupted for the preseason Big 12 rookie of the year.

Senior David Hoskins, K-State's leading returning scorer, also received a loud ovation.

On the women's side, some of the loudest introductions were for sophomore Ashley Sweat, junior Shalee Lehning and junior transfer Kelsey Nelson, sister of senior football player Jordy Nelson.

After the introduction of the coaches, Lehning spoke on behalf of the women's squad.

"People are sort of over-looking us, and they shouldn't be," she said.

Men's coach Frank Martin introduced himself by informing the audience that there would be no dunk contest, much to the chagrin of the fans in attendance.

Instead, the Wildcats did a layup drill that featured plenty of highlight-reel slams. They performed windmills, alley-oops and between-the-legs dunks — Beasley's specialty.

As expected, Beasley and Walker were the show-stoppers, but senior Blake Young was getting higher than last year, and 6-foot-10 junior Darren Kent was showing off some new skills.

After the dunk show, it was time for the men's scrimmage. Walker dunked nearly every time he touched the ball, answering any questions about his injured ACL in the process.

CROSS COUNTRY

12 runners set personal records

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A top-25 placing for the women and a total of 12 career-best times for both the men and the women was accomplished this weekend by the K-State cross-country teams at the pre-NCAA meet in Terre Haute, Ind.

The women placed 23rd out of the 38 teams at the meet. Junior Liliani Mendez was able to snag 49th place with a time of 21:11.5. Sophomore Beverly Ramos continued her strong presence, finishing in 59th place, and junior Emily Dittmore, who has struggled during the season, clocked a time of 22:19.8, almost one minute faster than her previous career-best 6K finish.

The only Wildcat who didn't set a personal best was senior Morgan Bonds. Also setting personal bests were senior Liz Rea, freshman Sydney Messick and sophomore Megan-Anne Perrin.

"I thought we were competitive," coach Michael Smith said. "We were hoping to be in the top 25, and we exceeded that expectation. It was a consistent performance with the way we've been running."

All six of the men who competed set personal bests. Junior Alex Umberger led the Wildcats and finished 32nd overall. Junior Danny Schneider was right behind him, finishing in 41st place, and junior Colin Swaney finished 47th in his first meet back from injury.

"They all ran their best," Smith said of the men's team.

"Having Colin back was very significant for the men. I know those three guys ran better than they have run before. With Colin, he helps our team and brings us a lower score."

Sophomore Tyler Fennema, junior Casey Johnson and freshman Clinton MacDonald also set personal records. Fennema was the only other Wildcat who finished in the top 100, garnering a 97th place finish with his time of 25:19.8.

"Tyler ran better than he has run before, and he can do better," Smith said. "I want to see our younger guys run better, so we can do better as a whole."

Cats sweep ISU; team ranked 4th in Big 12

STAFF REPORT

Going into Saturday's match, the K-State volleyball team had two options: take sole possession of fourth place in the Big 12 Conference or go home tied for fifth.

Nataly Korobkova and the 16th-ranked Wildcats chose the first option. Iowa State was left with the second.

K-State (14-5, 6-3) beat the Cyclones (11-8, 5-4) 3-0 in Ames, Iowa, by scores of 30-24, 30-25, 30-27.

Korobkova led the Wildcat attack, recording her fifth double-double this season with 18 kills and 10 digs.

Rita Liliom was the only other Wildcat to finish with double-digit kills. Liliom amassed 14 on .216 hitting, while Korobkova hit .361 on 36 attacks.

Coach Suzie Fritz has said several times this season she wants the Wildcats to have an aggressive serving attack, and her team came through Saturday.

K-State out-served Iowa State, tallying 10 aces to the Cyclones' two. Sophomore outside hitter Kelsey Chipman led the Wildcats, chalking up three. Rita Liliom and Jenny Jantsch both finished with two aces.

Senior libero Angie Lasta led K-State in digs, tallying 23 of the team's 63. Lasta's performance marks her sixth match this season of 20 or more digs.

The Wildcats have struggled this season in the first game, but not against the Cyclones. K-State led the entire game, with Iowa State's closest push coming at 10-11. The Wildcats then posted four-straight points, and the Cyclones could never close the

Editor,

The letters alleging the Collegian "hates free speech" Thursday in the Union need a crash course in the rights to free speech and a free press.

The group asserting the Collegian "censored" Chuck Armstrong's article, which was handed out by the group in the Union, clearly doesn't understand the right to free speech allows every person in this country to think and say what they want.

The right to a free press guarantees the media will operate separately from the government apparatus and remain under private control. Nowhere does the Constitution guarantee all thoughts and opinions held under the "free speech guarantee" will be printed in the "free press." The group did use its right to free speech correctly by speaking out in the Union. It's too bad they didn't have a case.

After reading the article, I agreed with the Collegian's decision. After its horrific decision to run Brigitte Brecheisen's now-infamous "miscreant" editorial, I was glad to see the

Editor,

As the president of a fraternity on campus which has a founding principle, "to lead in determining the rights and privileges of individuals in society," I was appalled at the racist propaganda being handed out in the K-State Student Union.

Apparently, the Collegian (very wisely) decided to not run an editorial written by the conservative writer Chuck Armstrong. The College Republicans felt it appropriate to spread this editorial to everyone possible in the Union.

This opinion piece contained inflammatory statements like "to side with Islam is to side with the enemy of America" and "the religion of Islam promotes the destruction of every foundation of America."

staff exercising more control within the editorial page.

Just because Armstrong – whose piece claimed "All Americans need to stand up for Western civilization" and "to side with Islam is to side with the enemy of America" – is a staff member does not mean his writing is above question. If anything, regular editorialists need to be held to a higher standard of fairness in what is meant to be intelligent, thought-provoking writing.

Cheers to the editors for having the foresight to not publish rubbish, and jeers to the Union and campus police for allowing these actions.

I close with a quote by Pastor Martin Niemöller that led me to stand up for what was right today: "First they came for the Jews, and I did not speak out because I was not a Jew. Then they came for the Communists, and I did not speak out because I was not a Communist. Then they came for the trade unionists, and I did not speak out because I was not a trade unionist. Then they came for me, and there was no one left to speak out for me."

Editor,

I wanted to express my viewpoint concerning the controversy surrounding the decision to not print Chuck Armstrong's last column.

I have read the column

Politicians should not use religion

Editor,

According to the most recent census, about 65 percent of Americans are Christian.

Many believe this is an inflated number due to the fact many people who should more likely be considered atheist or agnostic select some Christian religion on their census because it is convenient.

Also, when a parent selects a religion, all children under the age of 18 are automatically grouped in that same category.

With that in mind, it is more likely that the percentage of Americans who are practicing their religion is less than 50 percent.

Knowing this, we should realize that a presidential candidate's ability to run a country should not be based on his or her religious beliefs.

To make a decision for the people of this country tification for suppressing a valid opinion just because it might cause a stir, or worse, possibly offend someone, if printed.

Brett Vaughn

based on a religious faith is a slap to the face of all people who practice other religions.

Rather, we should recognize the shared, nonreligious specific, values that all human beings can understand and support.

I don't know about you, but when the next election rolls around I won't care which candidate had a better attendance record in church when they were young.

But, I will look for the person who has the best ability to run this country while being tolerant and understanding of all religious backgrounds.

Religion has no place in politics, and the day we achieve that is the day we can begin to move toward a more tolerant and peaceful world.

DETOUR | Construction should not affect Stampede, city revenue

Construction equipment has no choice but to cross the closed road, which will cause damage to the pavement. The road, however, will be repaired at the end of the project with minor changes made to the section downstream of the dam, McNulty said.

One of the major concerns regarding the detour is the effect it might or might not have on Country Stampede, which is held in the state park during the summer. Wayne Rouse, president/general manager of Country Stampede, said he has been assured that the road will be reopened for the duration of the event.

Concerns regarding city revenue also have been dismissed.

"I'm not concerned because it's part of the dam construction and stabilization project, and adjustments are made with the Country Stampede," said Bruce Snead, city commissioner. "From what I see, there's not much of a concern because there's still access to the area. I do not see significant economic impacts from that."

McNulty expressed only slight concern about parking inconvenience that the event might experience. The portion of the park used for a majority of parking has been deemed a spoils area that will not be available for use during the event.

"It's going to have impacts just because of the physical location, but the event will still continue; it's planned to go on," McNulty said. "The general admittance area is not impacted at all by this. The test program that we did, which we ended last April or May, had the biggest impact on the Country Stampede area, and we're done with that. We're just working along the Stampede area."

The portion of the road that comes in from the west will be repaired for the four days of Stampede, and detour signs will be covered. Working crews also will be eliminated because of the large amount of people that will be in the area, McNulty said.

Though one of the park's entrances will be blocked until Stampede, the other entrance will remain open for public use. The Corps believes it has identified all possible problems and dealt with them in the most convenient way possible.

"We're moving along as planned," McNulty said. "We anticipated the impacts of the project, and that's why we did the mitigation work upfront, which involved creating camping sites away from the dam. If campers don't want to camp near the construction area, then they can camp further away. Most of the impacts that we anticipated, we identified."

RICE | Gore to donate his share of prize for climate protection research on agriculture and the environment and its connection in providing outreach to the state it serves, Rice said.

At the IPCC's international meetings, Rice said he saw agricultural connections from across the world.

"It's important to bring that process in an international perspective," he said. "I learned a lot about international agriculture, and I could bring it back for my research and in the classroom."

The United Nations and the World Meteorological Organization created the IPCC in 1988 to assess the scientific, technical and socio-economic information relevant for the understanding of the risk of human-induced climate change, according to the IPCC Web site.

Gore said he would donate his half of the $1.5 million prize to the Alliance for Climate Protection, an organization he founded to persuade people to reduce global warming through cutting pollution, according to a CNN.com report Friday.

A White House spokesman said President George W. Bush is pleased about Gore's win, according to the CNN report.

The report also states that White House press secretary Tony Fratto said Bush would not be under pressure to adopt mandatory caps on greenhouse-gas emissions, which is a policy Gore has advocated.

Gore served as vice president from 1993-2001 and ran for president against Bush in 2000.

According to CNN, a source involved in Gore's past political campaigns said Gore has the ambition to use his Nobel Peace Prize win as a starting point to enter the 2008 presidential race.

While Gore repeatedly has denied having any plans to enter the race, a group of grassroots Democrats took out a full-page advertisement in the New York Times last week as a plea to change Gore's mind, the CNN report states.

A K-State connection to the IPCC and the Nobel Peace Prize will help make students more globally aware about climate changes and issues, Rice said.

"It increases the awareness of some of the current environmental issues facing the world today and maybe hopefully help do something that will help solve some of those problems in the future," he said. "I think that's one of the reasons the Nobel Peace Prize Committee decided on this was to help increase the awareness for action."

Conference next, hoping to improve on last season's 12th place finishes for both the men and women. The Big 12 Championships will be Oct. 26 in Lubbock, Texas. Smith said he has seen the teams make major strides.

"I think we're running up to our potential," he said. "My hope was that we could do that. It bodes well for how we do for the rest of the championship meets. Everything points to the Big 12 (meet). Given what we did today, we're ready for the Big 12, and we'll see what happens when we get there."

MADNESS | 4-star recruit a no-show at event

"Do you think Bill's knee is OK?" Martin asked the crowd after the scrimmage.

The fans exploded with cheers.

"Then I don't ever want to hear that question again," Martin said.

The only disappointment for the fans was that Dominique Sutton, a four-star 2007 recruit, was a no-show for the event.

"Dominique Sutton is still trying to meet qualifying standards and is not part of the basketball team at this time," Martin said. "I cannot comment any further due to NCAA regulations regarding prospective student athletes." While the team appears loaded with talent, Walker said the young players will need time to develop.

"We're not Top 25 yet," he said. "That's too much credit right now."

VOLLEYBALL | Cyclones commit fatal errors gap. The Cyclones committed a number of mistakes during the match, including seven service errors, 10 receiving errors and four blocking errors.

However, Iowa State had four players finish with 10 or more digs, led by Ashley Mass, who finished with 18. The Cyclones' attack featured Jen Malcom and Lauren Cummings, who finished with 12 and 13 kills, respectively.

Iowa State stuck with the Wildcats in game two, as the score was tied at 22-22. The Cyclones were unable to hold on and committed five errors.

In game three, the Cyclones jumped ahead early 4-1. The Wildcats were not behind for long and posted a 9-2 run to lead 10-6. Iowa State led as late as 21-20, but could not contain the Wildcats' attack.

K-State's next match is Wednesday against Texas Tech at Ahearn Field House. Play is scheduled to begin at 7 p.m.

WILL KANSAS STAND UP FOR CLEAN ENERGY?

IT'S EITHER CLEAN AIR OR MORE POLLUTION

Seven coal-fired plants in Kansas are plenty. Our state's power plants are already 77% above the national average for carbon dioxide emissions per person. Carbon dioxide is the ozone-causing, climate-changing pollutant behind global warming.

A whopping 75% of our electricity comes from coal. And so why would we consider raising that level?

WE ONLY GET 15% OF THE POWER, BUT KEEP 100% OF THE POLLUTION

The proposed 1400-MW coal-fired power plant at Holcomb would be one of the largest ever built in the U.S. The resulting 10 million tons of carbon dioxide this plant would produce each year would intensify the toll on public health and further damage our environment. That's on top of the estimated $3.5 billion cost to build the plant, which is almost certainly understated. Future taxes on carbon and other coal pollutants could drive the price up even higher.

The irony is, Kansans don't need that much extra electricity. Almost all of the power generated would be sold out of state. We'd just keep all the pollution.

COAL POLLUTION HARMS PUBLIC HEALTH

Beyond just carbon, other coal pollutants include mercury and particulates, as well as acid rain-causing sulfur and nitrogen oxide. It's hard to believe, but coal-fired plants actually emit 60 such pollutants, toxins and carcinogens.

It's a fact: Breathing bad air cuts lives short and burdens even unborn children with health consequences they must manage their entire lives - at great expense.

CLEAN NATURAL GAS + WIND POWER = THE KANSAS ANSWER

Clean-burning, domestically-produced natural gas cuts carbon emissions in half. It emits no mercury and no particulates. Natural gas is abundant, affordable and American. Add wind power (we're #3 in the U.S. for wind resources) and we can meet our power needs in Kansas and protect our environment - now and for future generations.

A floor of history

Archives aid students' research

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students would press their noses against the windows of University Archives and Manuscripts when Hale Library first opened in 1997. They wondered what the area was and if they could go in.

The archives are on the fifth floor of Hale with more than 150 years of K-State history — yet most students today probably are not aware of its existence.

An official university archives did not exist at K-State until 1983. It was then that a national search took place and Tony Crawford was hired as K-State's first official university archivist.

Crawford, who also serves as an associate professor and curator of manuscripts, said university archives contains original K-State academic department documents, photographs, scrapbooks, Kansas State Collegian and Royal Purple clippings and DVDs, among other historical items. One of its largest collections are the papers of every K-State president, Crawford said.

"Archives collects a variety of materials that document a variety of segments on campus," he said.

The oldest materials in the university archives date prior to the founding of Kansas State Agricultural College in 1863. During the 1850s, New Englanders came to Kansas and established Blue-mont Central College, which is where Founders Hill Apartments exist today.

Archival materials from Blue-mont Central College, now stored in archival boxes and folders, are the oldest in the University Archives and Manuscripts, Crawford said.

"It's been really special to see how archives has grown in its collection of K-State," he said. "It's really gratifying to see how its mission is being satisfied in maintaining the archives of K-State and maintaining a rich history so the legacy will not be forgotten."

The Council of State Archivists, along with the Society of American Archivists, developed a nationwide annual observance of Archives Month. Until this year, while most Archives Week activities occurred in October, a fixed, nationally recognized date for events did not exist, according to the Council of State Archivists Web site.

"More and more archivists think it's a good idea because many people don't know what an archive is," Crawford said. "We're trying to put that seed in peoples' minds."

K-State will have its first archives event in celebration of the month from 1-5 p.m. Friday on the fifth floor of Hale. University Archives tours will take place at 1 p.m., 2 p.m. and 4 p.m. Crawford will present "The University Archives: Preserving K-State's Legacy" at 3 p.m. in the Hemisphere Room.

"We think K-State has a really important legacy," Crawford said. "Students should be proud of the university and how it's grown."

About 1,000 people visit archives each year, and students are the largest group of its users, Crawford said. Students with academic majors like journalism and mass communications, history, English, architecture and women's studies often use archives as research for class projects, he said.

"We think that the archives is an extension of the classroom," Crawford said. "In some sense, we are a lab that's providing a resource for students to do research."

Two women were transported to Mercy Regional Health Center on Friday for bruising, lacerations and broken bones after the driver of a 2007 Chevrolet Malibu lost control of her car, according to police reports.

The driver, Lisa Field, was southbound on the 6000 block of Fort Riley Boulevard when she lost control of the vehicle allegedly because of wet-road conditions, according to a Riley County police report. The Malibu slid off the road and rolled several times before coming to a stop in the eastbound lane.

According to the report, Field, 24, was taken to the hospital for a broken collar bone, lacerations and possible internal bleeding. Passenger Shannon McCollum, 21, also was transported for minor bruising and lacerations. No citations were issued.

Board rejects proposals

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Urban Planning Board heard requests regarding the downtown redevelopment project Monday night and unanimously rejected all proposed changes to the area.

Representatives from Dial Realty and the Manhattan community voiced their concerns regarding the changes to members of the Urban Planning Board. The meeting was held Monday at 7 p.m. after the first meeting was postponed because of a sound-system failure.

The proposed changes included relocating the historic Strasser House, erecting a wall between the proposed Hy-Vee store on Fourth Street and adding 21,229 feet, or 11.8 percent, to the existing plan for the chain's building.

Members of the surrounding neighborhoods said they are upset because they think the proposed changes are different from the plans Dial Realty originally submitted.

"This is not a substantial change from where we started three to four years ago," said Bob Weistead, president of Dial Realty. "We have done a number of mitigating things in order to make this plan work."

Former New York attorney warns students about dangers of Internet

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students were encouraged to become more Internet safe and savvy during a lecture given by attorney and author C.L. Lindsay on Monday night in the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

Through a slideshow depicting action figures and various K-State and other college students drinking underage, using illegal drugs, illegally downloading music, movies and plagiarizing, Lindsay described the dangers and consequences of misunderstanding Internet privacy laws, or lack thereof.

"Think of the offline equivalent," Lindsay said.

Lindsay, a former New York attorney, left his practice in 1998 to found the Coalition for Student Academic Rights. CO-STAR is a nonprofit organization that helps college students and college professors with legal issues, and receives more than 10,000 legal requests each year. The overwhelming majority of requests CO-STAR receives is for issues involving incriminating photographs, illegal downloading and plagiarizing, Lindsay said.

The lecture opened with about 30 pictures of K-State students drinking underage, which he found posted on Facebook.com. One of the biggest complaints he said he receives is students getting in trouble by their campus judiciary systems for pictures of underage drinking and substance abuse on their so-called "private" Web sites like MySpace.com and Facebook.

"It's called the World Wide Web for a reason," Lindsay said. "You put something up for the whole world to see. So when you stick something up on the Internet, there's no way you could have a reasonable expectation of privacy."

However, he said it is almost impossible for a student to be caught by a criminal court for underage drinking because they cannot go off pictures alone. To be prosecuted, the court would need witnesses, evidence, etc. Yet Lindsay said all campus judiciary systems do not have to follow those rules. The only thing those institutions need is relevance, and if there is a picture of a student drinking underage — though anything could technically be in the cup, bottle or can — it is relevant.

"Colleges have a right to look at everything you post online," he said.

Lindsay also touched on the dangers of illegal music and movie downloads. On his slideshow, these illegal acts were portrayed by a Ken doll

Funds for Beach museum difficult to raise

After years of fundraising and rallying, the K-State Marianne Kistler Beach Museum of Art opened on Oct. 13, 1996, to house the university's ever-growing art collection. The museum's establishment was met with enthusiasm and support, so much so that the museum began construction of an additional wing 11 years later. The new wing opens this Sunday planned with a full day of activities.

It wasn't easy raising the money and support for the museum. An article from the August 1989 preview edition of the Collegian chronicles the birth of the Beach.

GROUP RAISES FUNDS FOR MUSEUM

By Sandy Payne
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Efforts are being made to gain support and raise funds for an art museum on campus to house K-State's art collection.

Ruth Ann Wefald, founder of the Museum Steering Committee, said K-State is the only major university in Kansas that does not have an art museum.

Wefald said when her husband, University president Jon Wefald, was interviewing for his job and the Wefalds asked about K-State, the absence of an art museum was continually mentioned.

After moving here from Minnesota, where she had been involved in the arts community, Wefald said, "The need for an art museum kept sticking out to me as being very great."

"Jon was involved in so many other things," she said. "I asked him if this was something I could get involved in, and he said he would be glad for me to."

In 1986, Wefald started the steering committee, made up of students, faculty, alumni and friends of K-State.

The committee has researched other universities to find out how they funded their museums, and in 1987, a private consulting firm was hired to conduct a feasibility study. The firm concluded that building a museum was not a feasible project at that time. Wefald said the decision was partly due to the economy in Kansas.

The firm also concluded for a fundraiser to be successful, it would have to be part of a larger drive.

In April 1990, the KSU Foundation will begin the Essential Edge Campaign, a five-year, $100 million fund-raising campaign. The proposed art museum will be included as part of that campaign.

Arthur Loub, Foundation president, said $4 million to $5 million is needed to build the proposed art museum.

Loub said there is no way to tell how long it will take to raise the money, and it is not uncommon for major gifts to take several years to mature. The University of Kansas worked for 10 years to raise funds for its art museum, he said.

Wefald said the consulting firm also found that few people were aware of the art collection at K-State. To reverse the situation and gain support for the museum, Wefald started "Celebrate the Arts at Kansas State."

This program involved traveling with one of the deans from the College of Arts and Sciences and Jessica Reichman, art collection curator. The group went around the state to Kansas City, Wichita, Norton, Hays and Salina to talk about and show slides of the art collection to people interested in helping K-State build a museum.

Wefald said the group hopes to present the program in Garden City, Dodge City, Topeka and other key cities.

"We are building friends for the museum," she said. "It is something we hope to get students involved in - it would be a definite plus and something we can all be proud of."

The permanent art collection was established in 1928 by professor John Helm, the Department of Architecture, and Birger Sandzen, an artist from Lindsborg.

The collection, which primarily consists of 20th century regional American art, contains about 1,000 items, including graphic art, paintings, photographs, sculptures and ceramic works.

Reichman said 75 to 80 perfect of the art work is stored in her office, and she is running out of space.

In April, a 40-piece collection, consisting of prints and antique Oriental ceramics, was given to K-State. The collection is a bequest of John H. Kohn, a 1950 graduate. Included in the collection are pieces by Grant Wood, Salvador Dali, Thomas Hart Benton and Pablo Picasso.

Reichman said the Kohn collection has yet to be displayed because of the limited number of buildings on campus equipped with proper security and environmental controls for displaying the works.

The prints need to be stored where temperature and humidity can be controlled. She is considering displaying them somewhere else in Manhattan.

"I really want to display these works. They are beautiful and certainly worthy of display and worthy of contemplation," she said. "I fully intend to display the ceramics on a semi-permanent basis in one of the buildings on campus."

Reichman said she would like to see the museum built on the corner of 17th and Denison in place of Memorial Stadium's west wing.

"This is a major goal for us," Reichman said. "I feel through the efforts of Ruth Ann Wefald and the Foundation, we have a very good chance of achieving our goal."

K-State aids students affected by disasters

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State helped more than 180 students who needed financial assistance because of the natural disasters that occurred this summer in Kansas.

According to a press release from the Kansas Board of Regents, K-State Financial Assistance helped 180 students by delaying their first tuition payment of this semester.

Larry Moeder, director of student financial assistance, said students affected by the disasters were contacted this summer to see if they needed financial assistance even before the Board of Regents announced its plan for all Regents universities to defer payments in June.

Students from 43 storm-ravaged Kansas counties, including the town of Greensburg, which was destroyed by a tornado in May, and severely flooded Coffeyville, were able to defer payments until Nov. 1.

"If it was a matter that they needed a little time to recover and if they had losses, we took that into account," Moeder said.

He said though many of these students have paid their initial tuition bill, some students still come in for assistance and others are coming back for additional assistance. Moeder said some students did not expect to be in financial trouble when the semester started but did not know how much the disaster would affect their families.

"It never seems to be over, and it's not going to be over for a while," he said.

Moeder said he does not know of any students who have dropped out because of the disasters.

He said the financial assistance department helps students with payments throughout the year mostly on an individual basis. This summer was the largest single group of people the department helped, he said.

"This is the first time a large amount of students were affected and needed the same assistance," he said.

Kip Peterson, Regents director of government relations and communications, said he does not know of any Regents action similar to this since he started working at the Regents four years ago.

"It's not often that you have so many natural disasters in the same area," Peterson said. "The students in these areas had a tough summer, and they had a lot on their mind."

According to the press release, 592 students at the six Regents universities were assisted by their universities.

TO THE POINT

Students should utilize archives

Most students aren't aware of it, but an absolute treasure trove of information lies in an unexpected place in Hale library. While there is valuable information in the books and periodicals on the main floors, University Archives on the fifth floor of the library exists to aid students in their research.

More than 150 years of K-State history are at our fingertips, ready to be discovered. Students can find information on just about every aspect of K-State, including facts and history about the founding of our school.

There are thousands of books, magazine and newspaper clippings and other types of informational sources many would not think to look check when researching.

The archives are a great resource for students doing research on class projects or papers and also for those who are looking to learn more about the university.

The archivists working at the library are always happy to help students with anything they might need found.

All in all, the fifth floor of the library is a largely unknown section of the library that contains many resources to help make research easier for students. So the next time you're researching and find yourself stumped by database and Internet searches, try the University Archives at Hale Library. You just might find what you're looking for.

Political embarrassment

Carter remarks about Bush's diplomacy despite own failed efforts

It is time for Jimmy Carter to realize Ronald Reagan isn't coming around to fix his mistakes anymore, and the American people no longer have a vested interest in his opinion. Just because Jimmy Carter still has the ability to speak, does not mean he should exercise his right to make a fool of himself – he did enough of that during his presidency.

BRIGITTE BRECHEISEN

In an Oct. 10 interview with Wolf Blitzer on CNN's "The Situation Room," Carter managed to not only attack President Bush and his administration by saying they are violating international torture prevention laws, but he encouraged a diplomacy-only policy with Iran.

Being the king of irony, the last person the United States needs to take advice from on international issues is Jimmy Carter. We can't forget, Carter's presidency was plagued with numerous failed foreign-policy initiatives, most notably with Iran.

According to the White House Web site, Jimmy Carter had "aspired to make government 'competent and compassionate,' responsive to the American people and their expectations." Carter was at least able to bask in the satisfaction of fulfilling his goal of forming a compassionate government – just ask the Iranians.

Carter's policies in Iran gave us not only the privilege of watching the Shah – which had governed Iran for 38 years and was an ally of the United States – fall during the Islamic Revolution, but he also sat back and watched Iranian revolutionaries hold 52 Americans hostage for 444 days at the U.S. embassy in Tehran.

During the interview with Blitzer, in a heroic attempt to be responsive to the American people, Carter to critiqued the Bush administration's handling of detainees at Guantanamo Bay. Carter claims Bush is violating the Geneva Convention and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

"The president is self-defining what we have done and authorized in the torture of prisoners," Carter told Blitzer.

It is preposterous to believe Bush would manipulate a definition of torture under which the United States could abide by. Yet liberals like Carter believe Bush's definition most certainly would say, "Use any and all means necessary to extract information from small children, women and minorities so we can send the poor to find more oil that I can personally benefit from."

It is important to recognize President Bush hasn't violated any laws, and Carter is perpetuating unfounded lies. According to the Sept.

22 issue of The Economist, the Department of Justice in 2002 said "as a wartime commander in chief whose main duty is to protect the American people, the president had the power to override both domestic and international law." Furthermore, American's suspected use of torture during wartime is considered trivial compared to Egypt, China, Russia, North Korea, Iraq, Israel, Myanmar and several African countries.

Apparent from Carter's ramblings, he does not benefit from hindsight. During Carter's interview on CNN, Blitzer asked him if there should be any military action taken against Iran. Carter said the United States should not attack Iran, but they should start communicating and using strong diplomatic means. He also stressed we need to stop threatening to attack Iran.

This approach is oddly reminiscent of the one he used against Iran when he was president, which, judging by the outcome, was ineffective. It would be ignorant of the United States to try to appease Iran into submission. If this approach was successful, then Iran would not have had U.S. citizens under their control for 444 days, Cuba wouldn't be a belligerent nuisance to the U.S., and North Korea wouldn't have the capabilities to produce nuclear weapons.

Jimmy Carter needs to understand his public appearances will never be able to redeem his image from the years of embarrassment as president. To this day, his foreign policy remains outdated and ignorant.

Dean makes a difference for Democrats who are still Everyone and their grandmother remembers Howard Dean's "Dean Scream" – when he notoriously yelled "yea-rarh!" at a concession speech after the 2004 Iowa caucus.

It was a proper ending to one of the most unconventional campaigns in history. Dean was an anomaly in the 2004 presidential election. He didn't swerve around issues, he didn't go to the rich for his campaign funds, and he didn't hold anything back while speaking behind the podium. Because of this, many people thought he was too liberal even though he made several conservative statements about issues like abortion and gay marriage.

He was a rising star up until the Iowa caucus and was a favorite to win the candidacy for a while. His completely different Internet-based fund raising strategy helped raise more than any other democratic candidate. Unfortunately, Dean, even with this money, was not the prototypical presidential candidate, and people weren't ready for him.

These days, Dean, a little quieter, is still making waves in the Democratic Party. Dean has been the DNC chair since 2005, and he has made a point during his tenure to focus on all 50 states and fundraising.

Dean raised more than any other DNC chairman in 2005 with his grassroots Internet campaigning, according to a March 2005 Boston Globe article. Dean mostly has continued this fundraising success – partially helped by the Democrats' success in Congress – and now 2008 presidential candidates are benefiting from Dean's innovative system.

According to the Hill, a congressional newspaper, Dean supporters, who helped him raise more than twice as much as Sen. John Kerry before the 2004 Iowa caucus, are now donating even more to 2008 candidates, especially Barack Obama.

Along with his fundraising platform, Dean also wanted to establish a party that did not leave out small states. When several larger states like Florida and Michigan announced they were moving their primaries to earlier in the year, Dean fought for Iowa's and New Hampshire's rights to have the initial primaries.

According to an Oct. 10 Tampa Tribune article, Dean said he would not invite Florida Democratic delegates to the national convention in August 2008 if they moved their primary before the Feb. 5 threshold set by the party.

I could understand Florida wanting more of a chance to determine the Democratic Party presidential candidate, but as we already know, Florida can have more of an effect on the elections than any state.

The thresholds are set up for a reason. After the initial small-state primaries, candidates probably would not take a second glance at these states while campaigning for eight months in California or Florida.

Every state has a right to at least see presidential candidates speak in person, and Dean is not afraid to give these states a say. He doesn't have allegiances to bigger states who might have more money or more prominent figures – which seems to be why he always is criticized.

Dean is not afraid to make decisions that anger the traditional powers of either party. Though some Democrats – and more Republicans – classify him as a crazy liberal, he is not. He is just a politician who doesn't act like a politician; he actually cares.

He wasn't the right personality for the White House, but only because of a tilted precedence of the typical president. It's sad a person that speaks his mind and can make such a difference in a party would have no chance to run a country.

It seems like a special breed from certain families are the only people capable of being president. Apparently a candidate that's a people-person like Howard Dean makes a better joke than a president.

Sisters support local music scene with record store

By April Newby
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"I do things in just-about," said 36-year-old Leah Cunnick, as she shoved aside piles of vinyl records and assorted band posters in the cramped back office of Sisters of Sound, an independent music store nestled away in Aggieville.

Leah and her sister Sarah Cunnick, 38, opened Sisters of Sound nearly three years ago. The sisters readied the store for its grand opening in "just about" two weeks. Sarah donated her entire personal music collection to the project — some 3,000 compact discs and 2,000 records — a collection nurtured by her 10 years of employment at Street Side Records, another used record store in Manhattan.

With various small CD and record donations and some serious manpower from friends, Sisters of Sound made its successful debut in December 2004 and has only flourished since.

Sarah's inspiration for the store came from her former job at Street Side Records.

"You never forget a store like Street Side," Sarah said. "You could tell the people there really cared about music."

When Street Side closed its doors, Sarah knew Manhattan needed another store like it. Coupled with her love for music and her sister's equal passion, Sisters of Sound was born.

Neither sister has a formal background in music. Sarah was a criminal justice major at K-State. Leah graduated from K-State with a degree in art.

"I'm limited to making art for band fliers and Sarah chases down kids that steal stuff," Leah said. "That's what we get out of our degrees."

However, the sisters have been around music their entire lives. They are the youngest two of eight children and learned how to handle vinyl from their older brothers, who were disc jockeys. Once the sisters made it to K-State, they went to as many local music shows as possible and made many close friends in the process.

"We don't go to class reunions to see old friends," Leah said. "We go to local shows. That's our class reunion."

The store offers an eclectic collection of music, on both CDs and vinyl records. Mostly smaller record label bands and back-catalogued music grace the shelves of Sisters of Sound, but the greatest pull for customers is the vinyl.

"We didn't mean for the store to become a vinyl store," Sarah said. "I just originally had so much in my collection and wanted to get rid of it."

Leah noted that vinyl has proved to be a real niche for collectors, since it keeps value very well, and so few new copies are made — typically only around 3,000 to 5,000 copies per record.

The customers that stop by Sisters of Sound are as diverse as the music offered.

"We have no typical customer," Sarah said. "I have customers who are professors, construction workers, collectors, military guys — people from all walks of life."

In addition to providing a variety of music for the community, Sisters of Sound also supports the local music scene. In fact, Sisters of Sound houses the offices of the Manhattan Music Coalition in the same small office Sarah and Leah share.

MMC advocates for live and local music in Manhattan. Leah and Sarah help the cause by distributing fliers and posting calendars of upcoming shows in the windows of their stores.

Sisters of Sound is home to much more than a small personal collection. Sarah and Leah get their music from a variety of distribution centers and customers wishing to sell their own collections. If a customer wants a CD or record not in the store, Sisters of Sound can order it for them at no extra cost.

Standing underneath a "We

"It's a good place to be," she said.

Clooney executes role with intensity

"Michael Clayton"

Movie review by Brendan Praeger

On the surface, "Michael Clayton" looks like a big-budget imitation of countless legal thrillers and John Grisham novels. A story of a corporate lawyer who uncovers a dirty secret and risks life and limb to expose the truth is hardly a fresh idea.

Luckily, great performances and perfect pacing push this film ahead of the pack.

Tony Gilroy, author of the "Bourne" trilogy, steps into the director's chair for the first time. While the "Bourne" movies flew by at a breakneck pace, "Michael Clayton" moves more deliberately. It's slow without being boring, and we get the chance to let it all sink in before the end.

George Clooney again proves himself as one of Hollywood's most reliable actors. He plays a "fixer" — a lawyer who takes care of problems without bringing negative attention to his firm. His performances in film's like "Intolerable Cruelty" and the "Ocean's" films seemed almost effortless, but here he replaces lighthearted charisma with urgency and intensity. It's one of the best performances of his career, and this is reason alone to see this film.

The other actors step up to the challenge as well. Tom Wilkinson is brilliant as a lawyer who has neglected his medication, and Tilda Swinton nails the role of a corporate executive facing a moral dilemma at the end of a six-year lawsuit.

Unlike some recent political and legal thrillers, "Michael Clayton" stays focused on the characters. It's not a tale of morality — it's a tale of powerful people who react differently under legal pressure.

This film probably won't please everyone. It takes its time to develop, and some viewers probably will lose interest before the story really comes together.

But overall, "Michael Clayton" is the perfect example of a legal thriller done right. If you're willing to let it sink in, it's not a film you will soon forget.

College football provides surprises

College football might be the most unpredictable sport in America.

In the last three weeks alone, there have been 19 up-sets of teams ranked in The Associated Press Top 25. That stat doesn't include Appalachian State beating Michigan in week one, in what could be the biggest upset in football history.

The first set of Bowl Championship Series rankings came out on Sunday, with USC at No. 14 and Florida, the defending National Champion, following at 15th.

KU is 13th.

KU has been in a fantasy world all year, and now analysts and computers are helping them out by keeping the Jayhawks' big heads inflated.

Lou Holtz, college football analyst, hasn't helped the situation either, as he commented on how good he thinks KU is on ESPN's "College Gameday Final."

"If I had to rank my top 5 teams right now, I'd put Ohio State at the top and in second I'd put — and don't laugh — the Kansas Jayhawks," Holtz said. "I know they haven't played anybody, but right now I think they're playing as well as anyone in the country, in every area of the game. They've got a lot of playmakers. I'm telling you, Kansas is for real."

Is he serious?

Sure KU is undefeated, but come on; the only good team they beat was K-State.

If Holtz or the computers watched that game, they would have noticed that the Wildcats played their worst game in a long time.

The Jayhawks finally have to board a plane to play a game this Saturday, as they travel to Colorado.

KU hasn't won in Boulder this century. They are 0-3, with their most recent visit resulting in a 44-13 beat down by the Buffs. If KU loses at Colorado again, it might be the beginning of the end for the Jayhawks, as they face a much tougher schedule in the next couple games.

A team doing the opposite of KU is Nebraska.

I'm starting to believe this is the year Husker fans finally vote coach Bill Callahan off the island. It seems Nebraska has had these rumors swirl ever since the Callahan era began. The Cornhuskers were ranked 20th at the beginning of the year, but once again, college football's unpredictability has reared its ugly head.

The concerns started to surface when Nebraska got lucky against a bad Ball State team, 41-40. Nebraska thought they were back on track after beating Iowa State — who is also a bad team — but Nebraska is now on a two-game losing streak. After being down 38-0 to Oklahoma State at the half, it is panic time in Huskerland.

The schedule just gets tougher for Nebraska as they play three of their last five games against ranked teams. If they don't get it together soon, Nebraska could go winless the rest of the year. If that happens, the Huskers would be 4-8. That would be their worst record since 2004, when they went 5-6 in Callahan's inaugural season.

KU and Nebraska are just two of the teams raising eyebrows this season. The season is at its halfway point, and still no one knows what teams are truly talented.

Get ready for an electric second half to 2007.

Age of innocence

Professor stays grounded by coaching youth soccer

By Andy Nelson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jordy Nelson is streaking down the sideline, blowing past defenders, churning up chunks of recently manicured turf. He has his eyes locked on the end zone and it seems as though nothing stands between him and pay-dirt. Just before reaching the goal line, out of nowhere, he hears his mother screaming from the stands. He stops dead in his tracks, turns and waves. Would coach Prince still be dancing merrily on the sideline?

If this scenario were true, K-State would be starting a different wide receiver even before Jordy could be scraped off of the 3-yard line and sent packing. But what if this incident took place in a more innocent time; at an age where the line between winning and losing was still fairly blurry?

On Tuesday and Thursday evenings when Steve Keeley, associate professor of horticulture, is not teaching students about turf grass or golf course management, he can be found on the practice field at Bluemont Elementary School. It is there he prepares the Attackers, a first-grade girls' soccer team in the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department youth league, for its next game.

Keeley goes over drills with his first-grade team. Keeley taught his team drills on passing and dribbling the ball to improve its play on the field.

Keeley said coaching the girls has provided him a way to be involved in many of the things he is passionate about. He said he coaches because he loves children.

"Enjoying the kids and seeing them improve is what is really fun," Keeley said.

A former ninth-grade football coach, Keeley said teaching the girls has given him a chance to get back onto the field. He said coaching has always been something that he enjoys.

Though there is an obvious difference in competition level between a high-school football squad and a soccer team made up primarily of 6-year-old girls, coaching the Attackers has shown Keeley the more innocent side of sports.

During halftime of a recent game, Keeley was giving his team a pep talk.

"I was telling them, 'You guys are playing really well. Good job. Good hustling,'" Keeley said. "Halle (a member of the team) spoke up and said, 'My cat had kittens.'"

It is this kind of innocence that leaves Keeley marveling at the way in which these girls view their world. He said it helps him to keep perspective on what is important.

The biggest gain Keeley wants the girls to get from this season is a fun experience and an appreciation of the sport. But a competitive spirit sometimes has him looking for more.

Often, after games, Keeley will ask his 6-year-old daughter Emily, who is on the team, if she

Prince prepares team for tough test at Oklahoma State

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coach Ron Prince addressed Saturday's game against the Oklahoma State Cowboys as a definite threat to K-State's schedule.

"Oklahoma State is an offensive juggernaut," Prince said. "They've got players either at or near the top of all the defensive categories. We have a challenging situation, going on the road against a team coming off a historically — you have to put this in context — a historical domination that they showed on Saturday."

Oklahoma State is coming off a 45-14 win over Nebraska, the Huskers' worst home loss since 1958. Prince said the Cowboys, who average 6.6 yards per snap, 484 yards per game and have 29 touchdowns so far this season, will be a tough test defensively for the Wildcats.

One concern Prince said he has is the depth of the Oklahoma State roster. They are led by senior running back Dantrell Savage, who had a career-high 212 rushing yards last weekend against Nebraska. One of their more notable players is senior linebacker Donovan Woods, who had a career-high 12 tackles last weekend. Woods, who was elected the defensive team captain, previously played quarterback and safety for the Cowboys.

"The challenge is they have so many play makers at so many positions that are physically dominant and appear to have their opponents so out-matched from a size standpoint," Prince said.

KICKING GAME SETS IN

K-State is used to having an excellent show of special teams. While most of the big plays this season have come from returns, the placekicker, transfer Brooks Rossman, made a big splash in Saturday's game against Colorado.

Rossman is the leading place kicker in the Big 12 Conference and ranks second in the nation in per-game average. He nailed four of five field goals Saturday, including a career-long attempt for 52 yards. He was awarded the Big 12 Special Teams Player of the Week for his efforts.

"We found some kicking-game plays," Prince said. "They did not come in our normal mode of big returns for touchdowns, but they were big. We got the kind of production from our field-goal kicker that made us very comfortable to take the points and take the field position and play in a certain way.

"Once it was apparent that he was on, that really helped us," Prince said. "We felt we needed to be impactful in the kicking game aside from just the return."

LINDSAY | Students sued for downloading

shoving a "Baywatch" DVD down his jeans in a movie store. This, Lindsay said, is essentially the same thing as downloading a "Baywatch" series from a computer.

But after explaining copyright infringement, anything downloaded in class for academic purposes is legal, and anything outside of class is illegal, Lindsay warned students about the latter. He said the Recording Industry of America has consistently looking to universities, catching and suing students for illegal downloads over the past few years.

"I would be very, very careful about downloading music on the university over the next couple years," he said, "because they're going to be looking for you, and it doesn't look like they're going to hold back."

Lastly, Lindsay warned about online predators.

"Think about how MySpace works," he said. "You can search for gender, within an age range, within the radius of a ZIP code. It is the perfect tool for sexual predators."

Lindsay said this past summer, MySpace kicked off 29,000 registered sex offenders, and these are just the ones signed up under their legal names. Anyone can make a MySpace account, he said. Lindsay even created one for his Scooby-Doo Shaggy action figure.

"At any given moment, right now, there are 40,000 predators online searching for their next target," he said. "You need to be careful."

Joey Dodds, senior in computer science, said he enjoyed Lindsay's presentation but said he thought the information given was not anything new.

"I probably won't change my Facebook that much," Dodds said. "I sort of already knew a lot of that stuff and was pretty aware of the issues being a computer science major, but the presentation was still a lot of fun."

The Union Program Council sponsored Monday night's lecture. Powell Runyan, UPC Forums Committee co-chair, said he thought Lindsay's presentation provided a lot of useful information for students to really apply to their personal situations.

"He put it in really easy terms to understand," said Runyan, junior in pre-professional construction science and management, "so I think a lot of people can take (the information) back and see how it interferes with their everyday lives, especially with the illegal downloading and plagiarism."

The archives are available for students, faculty, staff and administration. Materials located in the archive cannot be taken out of the department.

PLANNING | Residents support historic house

After outlining all changes in the proposal, Welstead gave the floor to Peter Hosch, assistant vice president of real estate for Hy-Vee.

"We love the community," Hosch said. "There is room for other grocers in this community, and we are ready to move in."

After Hosch finished, organized groups were given the chance to speak. However, no one made arguments for the changes.

Dixie West, Manhattan resident, said she looked forward to the new downtown when the plans were first presented.

"You have displaced many residents and small, local business owners for a series of chain stores and their associated oversized signage that can be found in Anywhere, America," West said.

The moving of the Strasser House was also a debated topic.

Over and over, Manhattan residents stood in front of the board and pleaded with them not to move the historic house.

"Moving the historic Strasser House will likely eliminate the possibility of its nomination to the National Register," said Jayme Morris-Hardeman, former city commissioner and Manhattan resident.

Morris-Hardeman said she voted for imminent domain when she served on the city council last year because she believed Dial had the best interests of the community at heart.

To end her speech, Morris-Hardeman asked the board to deny the request of the changes in "the interest of the community as a whole."

Marci Maullar, Manhattan resident and associate professor in the Department of Speech Communication, Theatre and Dance, said she feels Dial Corporation changed direction from the original plans.

"I feel that my neighbors and I have been betrayed by the Dial Corporation," Maullar said.

KEELEY | Coach busy with teaching, family had fun. He uses her as a kind of gauge to see if he was too intense.

"Internally I'm like, 'I wanna win,' but I always have to suppress that," Keeley said.

Besides the fear of going a little overboard and trying to teach the game to girls without much experience, the biggest challenge for Keeley is trying to make sure all the girls are getting equal playing time and a chance to play at every position. But to date, Keeley said he has not had any complaints from any of the parents.

Keeley started coaching youth soccer when his son Jack decided he wanted to play. Never having played the game himself, and with no soccer coaching experience, Keeley said he went out and bought a couple books on the game to prepare.

Now in his fourth year coaching youth soccer, Keeley said he has learned a lot and he still finds himself learning more as he goes along.

"Probably by the time our last child is out of there, I may be getting it down," Keeley said. "All of the kids kind of expect me to at least coach their team once, so I guess I'll be doing it for at least a few years."

Keeley and his wife, Terri, also have a three-year-old daughter, Jenna, who already is itching to get onto the field. Later this fall, the couple is expecting the seventh addition to their family.

Besides having a large family, Keeley also teaches two courses at K-State, conducts research and juggles 40 advisees. The members of his family also have their calendars pretty packed. With such a busy schedule, coaching has given him an opportunity to do things with the most important people in his life.

"It is a continual struggle when everybody is involved in a lot of activities," Keeley said. "It's been really good spending time with my own children because everybody is busy."

FOOTBALL | Game to be symbolic

introduced two Wildcats to starting positions. Sophomore quarterback Josh Freeman and sophomore running back Leon Patton saw their first starts one year ago against this team as freshmen. Prince said he prefers to play freshmen because they don't overanalyze the game.

"When you start true freshmen, they just go play," he said. "Sometimes, they aren't quite sure of the formation, so they just go play. That's really cool. That's why I like playing freshmen."

In that game, Freeman completed 10 of 15 passes for 177 yards. He had no interceptions and no touchdown passes on the day. Patton had 21 rushes for 159 yards and one touchdown.

"In their second year, sometimes they know too much," Prince said. "They have too much information. Maybe they're burdened by it. I think both of them have resisted that and I expect it to continue in the future."

“Go/No Go” Lists

The decisions about which Intercession courses “GO” will be based upon the number of registrations. The “Go/No Go” lists will be posted on our website—www.dce.k-state.edu/courses/intercession the week of December 10, 2007.

Be Prompt!

Because most classes are small, courses fill quickly. Early enrollment is strongly recommended to secure a place in the class and ensure the course will be a “GO.” Although registrations are accepted through the first day of class, delays in student registration could result in courses being canceled. If a student wants to take an Intercession course, it is strongly recommended he/she enroll between October 22–November 21, 2007.

Late Enrollments

A $25 late fee will be charged for enrollments received after the first class meeting ends. No enrollments will be accepted after two-thirds of the class meetings have elapsed.

Tuition

On-campus coursework will be assessed at resident/non-resident tuition rates. Off-campus coursework will be assessed at a rate of $243 per undergraduate hour and $324 per graduate hour with no distinction made concerning the student's resident/non-resident status. The on-campus fee structure for coursework administered by the Division of Continuing Education is as follows:

	Resident	Non-resident
Undergraduate per credit hour	$199.50	$524.00
Graduate per credit hour	$266.50	$597.50

Additional fees may be assessed for courses in the College of Business, Architecture, and Engineering.

Student Fees and Health Fees

Student fees and health fees are collected on a per-day basis at the rate of $1. Fees for on-campus January courses are computed by multiplying the number of days of instruction for the course by the $1 student fee/health fee rate. The fees are not assessed for off-campus instruction or audits.

[Note, not all services offered are open between semesters. Please refer to page 16 of the K-State undergraduate catalog for further fee information.]

Billing

An electronic bill (eBill) detailing your tuition charges will be made available to you on the 15th of each month following your enrollment. Your eBill notification will be sent to your K-State e-mail address. All students must have an electronic ID (eID) in order to receive this e-mail. If you have not yet created your eID, see “eIDs and Passwords” at www.k-state.edu/infotech/welcome/ for instructions. To access e-mail sent to your K-State e-mail account, click on “E-mail” at the website above and read about “WebMail.” Students may also log in to the KATS website (<http://kats.ksu.edu>) with their eID to view/update their account and obtain their eBill statement.

Retakes

Undergraduate students may retake courses during Intercession in order to improve their grades. Students must indicate “Retake” on the enrollment form when they register for the courses.

Audit

Audit fees are calculated at the lowest tuition rate available for a particular course. Thus, if a course is offered for 1 or 2 undergraduate or graduate credit hours, the student is assessed the tuition for 1 undergraduate resident credit hour. No record is made on the academic transcript and no student/health fees are assessed.

Grades

Intercession grades will be averaged into the student's K-State G.P.A. Grades will be available to students on KATS three weeks after the last day of Intercession. The scholastic record of each undergraduate is evaluated twice yearly, at the end of the fall semester and at the end of the spring semester. The student's scholastic status does not change as a result of work taken in Intercession.

Students wishing to sign up for courses on an A-Pass-Fail basis must do so at the time of registration, or before one-third of the class meetings have elapsed.

Status Change

No status changes (i.e., undergraduate to graduate credit) will be accepted after half of the scheduled class meetings have been completed. All requests for status changes must be submitted in writing to the Division of Continuing Education Registration Office.

Incomplete Policy

If an “I” is received during Intercession, and if the student does not make up the “I” before the end of the following regular semester, a grade may be given by the faculty member without further consultation with the student. If, after the end of the semester, the “I” remains on the record, it will be designated as an “F” and will be computed in the student's G.P.A., weighted at 0 points per credit. The designation of “NR” (no grade reported) will be treated in a like manner.

Canceled Classes

The “GO/NO GO” notice will be posted on our website—www.dce.k-state.edu/courses/intercession the week of December 10, 2007. Students may also phone 785-532-5566 for information. Students who enrolled in a canceled class have the option of registering in another class or obtaining a full refund. To officially drop or add a class, students must do so in writing or in person at 131 College Court Building.

Withdrawals

1) A student may withdraw from a class by written request prior to the completion of one-third of the scheduled class meetings without a grade being recorded on the student's transcript. 2) If a student withdraws after one-third, but before two-thirds of the scheduled class meetings, a grade of W (Withdrawn) will be issued. 3) No withdrawals will be accepted after two-thirds of the scheduled classes have been completed.

Drop/Add Procedure

To drop or add a course, students must submit a drop/add form (or other written notice) to the Registration Office, Division of Continuing Education, 131 College Court Building. Students who fail to attend class may receive an “F” unless they formally drop the course.

Refunds

All refund requests must be made in person or in writing to the Division Registrar, Division of Continuing Education, 131 College Court Building.

A 100% tuition refund will be issued if the request is received prior to the completion of 20% of the course, or if the class is canceled. A 50% tuition refund will be issued if received on or before the completion of 25% of the course. No refunds will be issued after 25% of the course is completed or if the course is being audited. No refunds will be issued for lab or material fees collected at registration after the first day of class, unless the course is canceled.

Library

During Intercession, the Hale Library hours of operation vary.

For current hours of operation check the web at www.lib.k-state.edu or call 785-532-3014.

Credit Hour Limit

The maximum credit hours allowed for Intercession is four (4) hours per student. Anyone wishing to enroll in more than the maximum credit hours must have written approval from his or her academic dean at the time of registration. Students wishing to sign up for courses on an A-Pass-Fail basis must do so at the time of registration, or before one-third of the class meetings have elapsed.

Textbooks

Textbooks (required or recommended) have been ordered for most classes and will be available at Varney's Bookstore at the start of Intercession. Information about textbooks is available from the instructor or from Varney's. Some extra copies may be available at the K-State Union Bookstore.

Students will explore sex and body image from the Puritans to today, including matters of race, class, marriage, work, and gender. The course is designed to help students tackle the changing reality of American sexuality by charting its historical currents in order to understand the past and explain the present.

Problems in FSHS: Family Law

1/2/2008 to 1/16/2008

1 p.m. –4 p.m. MTWUF

First comes love, then comes marriage, then comes baby in the baby carriage. This class reviews laws concerning families, property rights, and rights and duties of parents, single or married, to their children. We will cover laws regarding custody, visitation and child support, and rights of single parents as well as divorced parents. Many laws regarding family issues are the heart of our value system. Some laws are very controversial (i.e., abortion laws and custody arrangements ordered by the court). The body of family law changes more quickly than any other legislation nationwide. To add to the confusion, laws vary from state to state. Students will gain knowledge about family laws in Kansas and uniform laws that have been adopted throughout the states. Knowing about basic family law empowers students and will aid them in making better informed decisions about their lives.

Stand still

While growth is apparent in businesses like Best Buy, McAlisters and Mountain Mudd, across the street and the surrounding area are in the beginning stages of redevelopment, including a plethora of road closed signs.

Third Street construction finished, Fourth Street to be closed until June of next year for street renovations

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The mess of construction equipment, dirt and concrete on North Third and Fourth streets is not just making travel through the area harder.

The construction is part of a large downtown redevelopment project in Manhattan estimated at $194 million, meant to bring businesses and housing units, and also improve customer traffic and appearance of the downtown area.

The North Third Street construction from Leavenworth to Osage streets ended on schedule and opened Monday, assistant city manager Jason Hilgers said. He said the construction company tore up the old road, expanded it and replaced the pavement.

The North Fourth Street construction is a much larger project, Hilgers said. He said a third center-turning lane will be added as well as diagonal parking and a sidewalk on the east side of the road. He also said the project includes plans to add street and pedestrian lighting and landscaping work like sidewalk trees and plants.

"It's a much more pedestrian-friendly area, especially on the east side," Hilgers said. "It's all brand new."

He said the construction on North Fourth Street is scheduled to finish in June 2008, but he hopes to finish it sooner, depending on how cold the winter is.

"It all depends on how smooth the project goes," Hilgers said.

The construction on Third and Fourth streets, which includes construction from Third to Fourth streets on Osage Street, is estimated to cost about $3 million, Hilgers said.

Expert Tire, 307 N 3rd St., was one of several businesses affected by the construction. Though some businesses were forced to move, Expert Tire only had to close the main entrance from Third Street. Customers could still enter from Leavenworth Street, manager Ron Kramer said.

"It made it a little difficult for the customers, but it didn't affect business any," he said.

McAlister's Deli, 421 Tuttle Creek Blvd., is located just east of the construction. Bree Smith, a manager at McAlister's, said the construction has definitely affected business at the deli.

"Our sales have dropped significantly since the construction, especially during lunch hours," she said.

Lisa Rockley, executive director of Downtown Manhattan Inc., a volunteer organization representing more than 200 businesses of downtown Manhattan, said though some businesses have reported an impact on business, the reconstruction was important to the redevelopment project.

"In regards to the traffic and construction, construction is never popular, but it is necessary — especially in a development like this," Rockley said.

She said the construction on Fourth Street will allow it to serve as an entrance to the core of the redeveloped downtown Manhattan.

Manhattan women learn about dangers of heart disease

By Emily Sterk
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More than 400 women drank wine and ate chocolate from 5:30 to 8:30 p.m. Tuesday evening at the American Heart Association's third annual "Ladies Night Out" at the Clarion Hotel.

The event featured a presentation of the statistics and realities of heart disease, a silent auction, dinner and a motivational speaker.

"Women learn about their diet and leave knowing ways to help their health," said Lou Irwin, chair of Go Red for Women, part of the American Heart Association. "I hope two people will be able to change their lives in a positive way, whether it be seeing their doctor, exercising or influencing a family member."

Go Red For Women is a movement started by the American Heart Association dedicated to eradicating heart disease, according to the group's Web site, goredforwomen.org.

"Women put themselves after everyone else," Irwin said. "Now we need to put ourselves first. We need to change the perception of what women think of heart disease."

The event began with each woman receiving a rose and examining the different vendors in the hotel, who offered everything from purses and jewelry to spa treatments available for purchase.

The attendees could also test their cholesterol and blood pressure levels.

"Women should get tested once a year," said Jennifer Forshee, sales specialist for the pharmaceutical company Bayer.

Cam Walker, financial adviser for First Command Financial, said promoting at this type of event is a good opportunity not just for the company but for the women who attend.

"Studies show nine out of 10 women over the age 55 have to finance by themselves," Walker said. "It is an opportunity to educate women on how to take hold of their finances."

JoAnna Owens-Nauslar, guest speaker for the event, has spent 35 years promoting healthy living, according to the event's program.

"You have to take care of yourself," she said. "Sixty-two percent of us in this room do not have living performance

Shots fired at KU dorm during its fall break

By Emily Sterk
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An unknown gunman fired three shots as a University of Kansas residence hall last weekend during the university's fall break. No one was injured.

According to the crime alert on the KU Web site, www.ku.edu, the shots were fired at Lewis Hall between 5:30 p.m. Oct. 13 and 10:30 a.m. Oct. 14.

The alert posted that an unknown person shot into two windows on the east side of Ekdahl Dining Commons and one window on the west side of the Lewis Hall third floor lobby.

Chris Keary, assistant chief of police at KU, said no one was injured. Keary said the university is posting the crime alert, which will branch off to other news sources.

"We put out the crime alert to help bring any more information for who is responsible," Keary said.

Hannah Love, KU student body president, said no one was around because the incident happened over the students' fall break.

Students experience more inflation

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students are experiencing inflation about three times more than the average U.S. consumer, according to a K-State Economics Club report released today.

The club released its 2007 student price index based on prices observed during the third week of September in Manhattan. The club released the SPI to coincide with the Consumer Price Index, which the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics releases on the third Wednesday of each month, said Daniel Kuester, Economics Club adviser and assistant professor of economics.

The most significant increases took place with gas, groceries and tuition, according to the SPI worksheet. Prices are collected at the same locations each year, and the SPI increased 6.3 percent overall from 2006.

While exact figures were not available from the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics at press time this morning, Kuester said prices that urban customers pay have increased 2.1 percent, or one-third of the increase that college students in Manhattan experienced since September 2006.

About 20 students compiled the SPI data in categories like gas, groceries, tuition, pitchers of beer, housing, textbooks, pizza and movies.

"We try to mirror the Consumer Price Index to a certain degree," Kuester said. "We tried to find the products that students are really spending their money on."

The CPI is a large bundle of goods in the thousands that are measured consistently month to month, Kuester said. It also measures the average change over time in prices that urban customers pay for

DEGENERES IN THE DOGHOUSE

Ellen DeGeneres is having trouble with pet rescue agency Mutts and Moms after giving a pooch away to her hairdresser because it didn't get along with her cats.

She and partner Portia de Rossi adopted Iggy, a Brussels Griffon mix, on Sept. 20. But when things did not work out, DeGeneres gave the dog up.

In doing so, she violated an agreement with the agency.

DeGeneres went public in tears with the doggy ordeal Monday while taping an episode of her talk show that was to air Tuesday.

She admitted she didn't read all the paperwork involving the adoption.

BUSS SAYS BRYANT TRADE POSSIBLE

Jerry Buss already has shown that he'll part with superstars. Yet, upon hearing the owner of the Lakers would consider trading Kobe Bryant, even Shaquille O'Neal was shocked.

"I guess it's business before loyalty, but, wow. He said that?" (O'Neal said Thursday in Miami.)

Buss indeed did, telling three beat writers covering training camp in Honolulu on Wednesday that he "would certainly listen" to trade offers for the two-time scoring champion.

"At any time, I think you have to do that with anybody," Buss said, discussing Bryant for the first time since the frustrated star asked to be traded at the end of last season. "It's just part of the game, to listen to somebody who has a dissatisfied player that you think is going to fit. You can't keep too many loyalties. You've got to look at it as a business. He looks at it the same way."

Bryant, 29, has four years and $88.6 million left on his contract, but he can terminate the deal in two years and leave $47.8 million on the table.

ENTERTAINERS TO PERFORM FOR JENA 6

ALEXANDRIA, La. — Several prominent black entertainers plan to participate Thursday in the "Rally and March for Peace and Justice" in Jena, La.

Six black students at Jena High School faced stiff charges over a December attack on a white student, bringing criticism that blacks were being treated more harshly than whites after racial confrontations and fights at the school.

"Free the Jena Six Rally and Concert" organizer Catrina Wallace said rappers Lyfe Jennings and David Banner will perform at LaSalle Parish Ward 10 Recreational Park in Jena.

Other scheduled artists include Hurricane Chris, Cupid, Big Unk, Bay Bay, Trill Ent, Big Boom and 2Throwed, Sunni Patterson and Stooze's Brass Band.

Other entertainers who are not affiliated with Wallace's production but have confirmed appearances are rapper/poet Mos Def, comedians Steve Harvey and Rickey Smiley and radio show host Tom Joyner.

Syndicated radio show host Michael Baisden will broadcast his show from Jena on Thursday.

Television talk show host and author of "Snakes In the Pulpit" Reuben Armstrong plans to be in Jena on Wednesday and Thursday.

"If this happened to a Caucasian, we'd be there fighting, too," Armstrong said. "It's not even a black and white thing we're fighting. It's a right and wrong thing."

Religious group reaches out to all students

By Amanda Keim
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An assembly of students come together to raise their hands and hearts to their savior, Jesus Christ. They gather around a praise and worship band and move physically and emotionally with the music.

Members lift their heads toward the ceiling and welcome the Lord into their lives with everlasting conviction.

Every Wednesday, the members of Chi Alpha gather in the K-State Student Union Little Theatre to grow closer to Christ through fellowship. At 7 p.m., band members tune their instruments, and a flow of diverse individuals enter the theater. All carry a smile and warm embrace.

Bryan Elliot, Chi Alpha director, said the group of 50-60 students who attend the weekly meetings has grown in the past years in number and in spirit.

"I've seen students have their futures radically altered," Elliot said. "Last year we had a Japanese student that was an agnostic and just wanted to experience American culture, so he came. He ended up becoming a believer and getting baptized the week before he went back to Japan."

Jonathan Culver, freshman in civil engineering, recently joined Chi Alpha and said he already has seen Christ work in him through the fellowship.

"I felt more in touch with the students because they were students and not adults," Culver said. "To come to a place with just students is great. I've been able to talk to more people spiritually about God. I'm more open."

During college, Culver said he plans to become an intricate part of Chi Alpha as he works to become an alumnus of the group and eventually a youth leader and member of the worship team.

"Whether you're saved, you know Christ, you don't know Christ, you can still come," Culver said. "We're all students. We're all family — one big goofy family. God changes people in big ways. I wouldn't be here if it weren't for him."

The connection with God that Chi Alpha presents to its members stays with them long after they have graduated college. Brett Lohr, Chi Alpha student coordinator, is an example of the bond.

Lohr graduated from K-State in December 2005 and said his dedication to Chi Alpha was not as strong during his college career as it is today.

"It's been pretty much amazing," Lohr said. "Chi Alpha, for me, has created the realization that as a Christian I have a responsibility to take action. I actually was an alumni before I became really involved and we went to World Mission Summit to impress the importance of missions throughout the world, and it hit me then that I hadn't done anything to change the world."

Chi Alpha is an outreach,

Lohr said. The "mission mindset" of the group focuses on what it can do for the rest of campus. Next fall, Lohr said he plans to participate in an internship and eventually head up a Chi Alpha of his own.

"The two overriding Biblical commands are to love God and love everyone else," Lohr said. "It's a really easy command when you get down to it."

New and old members of Chi Alpha said they share a love for the Lord and also the rest of the world. Members said the group always welcomes new members to share in their fellowship and relationship with God.

"If they're not a Christian, I hope they have an accurate interpretation of Jesus Christ and an open invitation," Elliot said. "If they are a Christian, I want them to have a deeper relationship with Jesus Christ. Wherever they are on the spectrum, I want them to grow deeper."

Commission approves district-fee increases

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Commissioners unanimously approved an ordinance to levy fees from area merchants to fund the Aggieville and Downtown Business Improvement districts, at the city commission meeting Tuesday night in City Hall.

These districts were created to fund various revitalization projects in the Aggieville and downtown areas in and around Manhattan Town Center, city officials said.

"A substantial number of improvements we often see in the downtown or in Aggieville are undertaken by these business improvement districts and sometimes people confuse that with the city doing it or with other entities doing it, but actually it's the merchants within the business districts themselves doing it, and I think they ought to be commended for that," city commissioner Jim Sherow said.

Every year, businesses within the two districts are required to pay a fee, which varies in cost depending on the location, the type of business and how many square feet the business covers.

In Aggieville, the approved ordinance will raise fees from $125 to $150 for businesses less than 1,000 square feet, and continue on a scale to raise the fee for businesses with more than 5,000 square feet from $450 to $600, city officials said.

The ordinance also will raise the fee 10 percent for businesses within the downtown district, city officials said.

It also will change some of the district boundaries in the downtown business area, which will be expanded to include businesses on North Third Street, as well as some small areas on the north side of the district.

Also, the ordinance will create a new billing distinction between retail and non-retail businesses. It will modify some of the billing areas classifications and the billing process of vacant properties, city officials said.

The commissioners also unanimously approved a funding request of $74,800 from the Core Downtown Revitalization Committee.

The CDRC was created in fall 2006 to plan an urban design for the core downtown area, city officials said.

"I would say it's hard to get to a destination if you don't have a plan, and in my view, this is the purpose of this investment as you call it, and I think it's perfectly appropriate to do that," said city commissioner Bob Strawn.

The committee performed a market analysis of the area, which was used to create a multi-phase building program.

"We, as a city, are committed to creating an integrated downtown redevelopment effort," said Mayor Tom Phillips.

TO THE POINT

Students should learn to budget funds better

Today the Consumer Price Index values will be released to the public as a means of showing the average rate of inflation for the goods we buy everyday. K-State students need to realize inflation has the potential of hitting us the hardest.

As college students on a strict budget – and usually fixed income – we should commend efforts and research collected by the K-State Economics Club. Their analysis of the prices of goods and services here in Manhattan over the past six years provides K-State students with a wonderful tool to create their own budgets.

With the increased costs of expenditures, it is important for students to create a budget, to help plan for rising costs due to inflation. Students who practice financial responsibility and make it a habit to allocate resources correctly will carry those practices into the future.

Many of the costs students are forced to pay are not in their control. These include tuition, books and gasoline. However, other expenditures in a student's life can be controlled through recognizing needs and wants.

While needs always should come first, wants are still easily obtained through simple ways of cutting costs. Cutting costs can be easy and non-intrusive to a student's daily routine. For example, students could brew coffee instead of buying a cup at Starbucks, drink water instead of the sugary drink that comes with the value meal, look for local food and drink specials at bars and pack sack lunches.

Being knowledgeable about one's finances is the first line of defense against financial trouble.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Those who said the free market couldn't be trusted are wrong, once again. There is a whole new kind of free market in our markets these days.

According to The Chicago Sun-Times, on Oct. 12, the British band Radiohead, rather than signing a new record deal, has offered its fans the choice of paying what it thinks is fair as consumers – which includes paying nothing at all – for its new 10-song album, "In Rainbows."

Those who believed Radiohead would come out of this unusual business decision with moths flying out of its pockets will be surprised to know, the band members said, "two-thirds of the nearly one million fans who have accessed the music have chosen to pay an average price of about $10."

That's a large sum of revenue without the conventional worry and cost of falling demand because of the illegal downloading and high compact-disc prices. More importantly, the option to download music for free from the band's site means no one could download it illegally.

Radiohead thought outside of the proverbial CD case and utilized today's technology to avoid the fixed costs of producing and distributing music on a physical CD. The band's music is now a digital file, and the cost is based on the quality of artistic production alone.

By trusting their consumers to support them and give feedback in monetary form, the members of Radiohead have created a successful financial venture considering they already have received the returns they expected.

Since the technology to download music became available to the public, record companies have aggressively pursued restrictions on illegal music downloading and punishment of violators of the restrictions, as they did in the case of a single mother from Minnesota.

The Associated Press reported on Oct. 5, Jammie Thomas has been ordered to pay $222,000 for 24 songs she illegally downloaded. But with the anonymity and limitless capacity for downloading, violators still run a very low risk of being caught stealing artists' intellectual property.

Record companies blame these multitudes of lawbreakers for the fall in record sales. While illegal downloading might be a slight contribution, it's quite possible illegal downloaders wouldn't have bought the record if they couldn't download it for free in the first place. Also, it could be consumers are simply boycotting the rise of CD prices. Regardless, artists ultimately suffer the consequences, unless they offer incentives to raise sales like Radiohead.

CHRISTINA FORSBERG

The Chicago Sun-Times embedded a poll in the article asking readers what price they would choose to pay for a downloaded music album.

Though the options offered on the poll only allowed the choices of $1, $5 or $10, almost 50 percent, or more than 500 votes cast, opted to pay $5 for a downloaded album, and nearly 30 percent would pay $10.

Fans who liked the album were more likely to pay for it, thus encouraging the production of more songs of similar or better quality.

Instead of sticking to the traditional business models for music production and distribution, record companies need to keep up with the technological advancements available to consumers and artists to avoid becoming obsolete. While Radiohead still uses a publicity firm to promote their music, their success indicates they've already exceeded the expectations of their fans in a new and innovative way, without the help of a label.

Beyond the music industry, it will be interesting to see who else would consider adopting this model and in what kinds of markets it will succeed or fail.

While there's still no such thing as a free lunch, Radiohead has given its consumers – not the producers – the freedom and responsibility to pay the price they believe the music is worth. We should expect nothing less from any free market.

Freedom of speech lacks empathy on college campuses

Bold words are meant to grab a reader's attention and draw their eyes to the page. Some words, however, should not be used as a cheap trick or publicity stunt.

Though every citizen is given a right to freedom of speech, it is up to individuals to decide what and when it is appropriate to use that freedom.

Colorado State University's student newspaper, The Rocky Mountain Collegian, provides a good example of what can happen when tact is not used in conjunction with the freedom of expression.

In a closed-door meeting with university officials, the editor in chief kept his job after using four simple words as the editorial board: "Taser this: F--- Bush!" According to CNN the newspaper lost $50,000 in revenue.

Not only was the editorial board shocking, it was aimed at the president of the United States – who had nothing to do with the student who was tasered in Florida – and our police. Though his opinions are respected because of the First Amendment, they go against many major issues of our time that require our support.

There are ethics, standards and propriety guidelines in journalism. These exist to protect the general good of society, and the journalists.

They also are societal rules we learn as children and teenagers, like using tact and empathy when speaking to certain people.

According to CNN, J. David McSwane, editor in chief of the Rocky Mountain Collegian, seemed unappreciative and showed little emotion through the process of examination, and he showed no remorse for the vulgar editorial board.

McSwane obviously has not learned his lesson. He should not have kept his job and should have learned his ability to shock readers is not flattering to his journalism credentials or the paper itself.

Being young is no excuse for stupidity. Students are extremely close to the line of professionalism and are old enough to know better, so all negative press received is completely deserved.

Newspapers are meant to spread accurate news to the world. However, without acuteness, one can be offensive and crude.

In a press release sent out by the Rocky Mountain Collegian, McSwane said, "I am proud to be a student at a university that respects students' First Amendment rights."

If McSwane wants to be a serious journalist, perhaps he should learn how the real world works. There are consequences for his actions.

Local band offers different rock sound

By Molly Sanders
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Anyone who knows anything about local music knows it is difficult to achieve success in the music industry. But for Mora Marie, being in a band is all about having fun and making music.

The band, made up of five Manhattan residents, all of whom are former or current K-State students, has been together for five months. The group has seven songs and is currently focused on becoming more widely known on the Manhattan music scene.

The band formed in spring 2007 when guitarist Dane Schmidt began searching for other band members. Lead vocalist Krystal Highfill was originally brought onboard as a guitarist, but later decided she would rather do vocals and play some piano. The female voice, along with the rock instruments, gives the band an original sound that makes it stand out from other area bands of the same genre.

Bassist Scott Schlageck and drummer Joe Griffiths came as a package deal from a former band. The second guitarist, Eric Moon, was added after Schmidt heard him play at an open mic night on campus. Each of the five members brings their own different style to the band.

Because the band started as a random group of people, personality clashes were always a worry. But instead, the diversity of the band members resulted positively in an original music sound. When asked why the band chose its style of music, Schmidt said it just ended up that way.

"We just play a mixture of what we like, but anything in a minor key is good," Schmidt said.

The band's influence ranges from mainstream bands, like Evanescence and Green Day, to lesser known bands, like Genghis Tron, The Human Abstract and The Locust.

The group performs two covers, "Trade This Fear" by Vedera and "The Kill" by Thirty Seconds to Mars. Performing "The Kill" with a female voice gives them a new sound.

At the band's performance on Aug. 23 at The Boobie Trap Bar on Gage Street in Topeka, Highfill gave an energetic performance as the lone female band member, while still creating a comfortable environment for the audience. Forty to 50 people, ranging from college-aged to middle-aged attended gathered in the small bar. By the end of the show, the stage was barely visible through the cigarette smoke. Audience members sipped their drinks and enjoyed the laid-back atmosphere. Several musicians in the audience commented on both of the guitarists' talent and the amazing way their fingers were flying across the frets.

At every show, Schmidt goes offstage and has a member of the audience help him out on the guitar. He teaches the audience member the guitar-fret fingerings while Schmidt does all of the strumming and tapping.

"It doesn't matter if we're playing for six people or 100 people, we always give a good show, no matter what," Schlageck said.

Healthy drink serves as alternative to caffeine, soda

Whether you're looking for a substitute for a meal, a quick snack or a way to beat the flu, smoothies are a great option.

Smoothies have been around since the middle of last century and have gained popularity throughout the years. More and more places are selling smoothies, and Manhattan is no exception.

With its recent addition of the Smoothie Pit, Pita Pit has joined many other businesses that have chosen to adopt the smoothie craze.

Caribou Coffee in the K-State Student Union also has a variety of smoothies. Sonic Drive-In, Radina's Coffeehouse, Bluestem Bistro and Panera Bread are just a few places in town that also offer the cool beverages.

If you decide to save money and make your smoothies at home, there are only three items you need: a blender, something to add for flavor — like fruit or vegetables — and a base to make the drink smooth. Bases can be ice, ice cream or yogurt, depending on personal preference or what is readily available.

To begin, you must decide whether to make an icy smoothie or the softer version with ice cream. If you decide to go with ice, you can cut down on the sugars that come in ice cream. If you really want to add ice cream, you can choose a low-fat or low-sugar variety to make it as healthy as possible.

You can use either a traditional blender or a specialized smoothie blender online. Amazon.com has blenders priced $17.99 to $34.95. However, it's not crucial to buy a specialized machine, as a regular blender will work just fine.

If you decide to opt for ice as your smoothie base, your choices are somewhat limited to either crushed or cubed. However, with ice cream and yogurt, the sky is the limit with options. The most common base is vanilla because it's a flavor that mixes well with other ingredients. You can use any flavor, but you should experiment to find the right flavor.

After you make the decision, the next step is choosing ingredients to blend with the base. Just like the base of the concoction, the possibilities here are endless.

Some people like to use different combinations of fruit, while others choose to make the drink even healthier and mix in vegetables or protein powder. Fruit smoothies, like strawberry-kiwi and banana with peanut butter, are popular flavors and can be easily made at home.

In addition to fruit and vegetable add-ins, some smoothie makers add supplements and energy boosters to the recipe.

Whether you choose to make your own smoothie or buy one from one of Manhattan's smoothie vendors, it is nearly impossible to go wrong with this healthy break from the everyday, fast food menu.

'Across the Universe' wastes great music on a terrible story

"Across the Universe"

Movie review by Brendan Praeger

Musicals usually live or die with the quality of their music. "Across the Universe," a film featuring music by The Beatles, should have had an easy path to greatness.

But, unlike most musicals that use songs to enhance the plot, the writers of

"Across the Universe" conjured up weak characters and subplots simply to justify musical choices.

Instead of a well-formed narrative, the plot seems lazy and forced. It feels more like an awkward collection of music videos than an actual story.

The primary plot revolves around Jude (Jim Sturgess), a shipbuilder from England who travels to the United States to find his estranged father. He meets a college student named Max (Joe Anderson) and falls in love with his sister, Lucy (Evan Rachel Wood). Eventually, Max is drafted, Lucy becomes an activist and Jude becomes an artist. Mix in some poorly handled political statements and a predictable love story, and you have a relatively boring tale.

The story isn't terrible, but it gets lost in a sea of tacked-on side stories that only exist to justify a few extra musical numbers.

The film also features a few cameos that do nothing but extend the already unbearable running time of 131 minutes. Salma Hayek and Eddie Izzard are barely noticeable, but Bono poorly lip syncs "I Am the Walrus" in a completely wasted scene that attempts to recreate an acid trip.

The film isn't a complete waste. Julie Taymor, director of "The Lion King" on Broadway, gives a few of the songs exciting choreography and interesting cinematography. "With a Little Help From my Friends," "It Won't Be Long" and "I've Just Seen a Face" are as good as any music video you'll see on television. In places, the art is also visually stunning, but the quality is wildly inconsistent.

For every song that's done well, two or three are completely mishandled.

I'd be willing to ignore the poor narrative choices if the film was even remotely enjoyable. Watching it is like listening to a long compact disc with only a few good songs — except here, we can't skip to the next song when we get bored.

Customize your own workout

If you have been working out the same way since high school, you are not alone. People from all walks of life are holding on to their high-school conditioning experience like it's going out of style. Well, I hate to break it to you, but unless you are a freshman, it probably is.

KENDALL HALL

Whether you are broke, stubborn or just too macho to get a personal trainer to give you some advice, there are guidelines anyone can follow to develop their own strength-training routine.

Typically a well-rounded routine begins with a warm-up, includes a conditioning section and ends in a cool down. Five to 10 minutes on the arc-trainer prepares your body for exercise.

Macho types, listen up. If you insist on skipping a traditional warmup, then at least take the time to structure your weight training so you are using the largest muscle groups first. By doing this, you are warming up the smaller muscles, while still maintaining your image.

According to the American Council on Exercise, it takes about 48 hours for muscles to completely recover after exercise. If you are trying to plan a workout, why not alternate between upper and lower body on subsequent days? Some people might break their workouts down even further — and that's great — but for the beginning exerciser, doing an hour of shoulder training may be too much.

Now you have to decide how much time to devote to exercising on a particular day. One technique personal trainers use is called active rest. Active rest means you do one exercise — for example, bicep curls — and then instead of wandering around the weight room for two minutes while you recover between sets, you work out another body part, typically the antagonist muscle — which in this example would be the triceps. This allows you to cut the amount of time you are working out, and it also keeps your heart rate elevated.

Another question people ask when designing their own weight training program is how many reps and sets to perform. A general rule to follow is if you want to build muscle mass, or like the macho men would say, "get big," perform more sets of fewer reps with more weight. Ladies, I know getting big doesn't sound very appealing, and you are going more for the toned look. You want to stick with fewer sets of more reps with moderate weight.

After referring to the rule mentioned above, a safe way to figure out how much weight is enough is to listen to what your body is saying. Guys training for large muscle gains are constantly overloading their muscles. All I have to say is go for it guys, but please find a spotter.

For ladies who want to know how much to lift, a good way to judge if you are lifting enough is to complete one set. Your last two reps in your set should be pretty tough. Pretty tough doesn't mean gritting your teeth and growling, but it doesn't mean easy either.

Finally, finish your workout with a cool down. Anything that allows your body temperature, heart rate and blood pressure to fall gradually is satisfactory. This could be a slow walk around the track or a few abdominal exercises, followed by some stretching.

So, you have the information — go ahead and try your hand at program design. As always, if you have questions on something, ask.

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

After scoring, the volleyball team celebrates a point against Texas at their last home match. The team will play at home tonight at Ahearn Field House against Texas Tech at 7 p.m.

Wildcats return home after a week away from Ahearn

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's volleyball team will return home Wednesday to Ahearn Field House where it has posted a 6-2 record this season.

It comes at a good time for the Wildcats (14-5) who are trying to recover from an early-October slump.

K-State lost consecutive matches for the first time this season when it fell to Texas and Nebraska.

The Wildcats took their first step out of the slide Saturday when they swept Iowa State.

The victory moved K-State from 16th to 14th in the Top 25 rankings. It's their highest spot of the season and their highest rank in four years.

K-State hasn't competed at Ahearn since Oct. 6 when it fell in five games to the Longhorns.

A bye last Wednesday contributed to the extended stay away from home. The bye was a part of Big 12 scheduling.

"It's just the schedule they give us," head coach Suzie Fritz said. "It's always wonderful when we have opportunities to play in Ahearn in front of our people and our fans and in our environment. We are just more comfortable at home than we are in other places."

The Wildcats played three close games in their Saturday match with the Cyclones, using defense to earn an important Big 12 road victory and their first win of the month. The win moved K-State into fourth in the conference standings.

"We played well against Texas, we just didn't play well in critical times in the match that didn't allow us to get the win," Fritz said. "I felt like we played pretty well against Iowa State.

"To win in three games at anybody else's place is a significant accomplishment."

The return home doesn't draw an easy match-up for the Wildcats, as they will welcome Texas Tech at 7 p.m. The game will be broadcast on 1350 KMAN.

The Red Raiders (7-11) have struggled in conference play — posting a 1-8 record — but Texas Tech can catch any team off guard with its fast style of play that allows them to make quick changes on the floor, Fritz said.

"They are versatile, they are fast, they have some very nice quick hitters, so in system I think they can be dangerous in that they have the versatility to move their hitters around and do a variety of things," Fritz said.

K-State is 13-1 this season against unranked opponents with the single loss coming to Oklahoma on Sept. 19.

Last year, the Red Raiders were the only team the Wildcats swept in the season series. The win also was the Wildcats' first conference win. K-State has won 10 of the last 11 matches against the Red Raiders.

Media Day provides K-State women's basketball team opportunity to talk about upcoming season

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

K-State's Ashley Sweat will return for her sophomore season after finishing last season as one of the best freshmen in the Big 12, coach Deb Patterson said Tuesday at Big 12 Media Day in Kansas City, Mo.

By Ryne Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's basketball team lost in a three-overtime WNIT game against Wyoming to end its 2006-07 campaign. That might have been a disappointment for the Wildcats, but at the Big 12 Media Day in Kansas City, Mo., yesterday, they remained hopeful about the 2007-08 season.

"We're very excited about the opening of the Big 12 season and feel as though we have a team that has a great opportunity to move up the Big 12 standings significantly this season," said head coach Deb Patterson.

The Wildcats finished last season with a 16-14 record and a 4-12 record in Big 12 Conference play. They played the final 18 games without junior Marlies Gipson, who injured her knee at the beginning of Big 12 play. She averaged 12.8 points and 8.3 rebounds before her injury.

"She looks great at this point in time, at the beginning of the practices that we've had," Patterson said. "It's sort of something that at this stage, as you watch her practice, you feel (the injury) is truly history. It's completely behind."

Also returning in the frontcourt is sophomore Ashley Sweat, who was a consistent threat from the inside last season. She scored in double figures in 19 games and averaged 11.4 points overall. She also grabbed 4.9 rebounds per game.

Patterson has big expectations for the McPherson, Kan., native. Sweat has been in the program for a year and it is something Patterson thinks she has benefited from.

"Ashley made incredible progress through the course of the year," Patterson said. "She went from a player that wasn't very mentally or physically strong to one who embraced the challenges that big-time basketball brings to the floor. She was thrown into the fire, so to speak, once we lost Marlies."

Junior guard Shalee Lehning, should benefit from the wealth of talent in the low-post.

"The depth is unbelievable," Lehning said. "All of these players have the ability to perform at a high level. It is going to take pressure off the perimeter."

The perimeter, including Lehning, has a mix of veterans and newcomers. Senior Kimberly Dietz and sophomore Kari Kincaid return, while newcomers include junior Kelsey Nelson and freshmen Shalin Spani and Kelsey Hill.

Lehning was an All-Big 12 Honorable Mention last season after she averaged 7.9 points, 6.9 rebounds and 5.2 assists per game. Patterson said she is excited to see Lehning play with the type of team K-State has this year.

"I continue to say she's not just one of the best in the league, but I think one of the best in the country," Patterson said.

This season starts on Nov. 1 with an exhibition against Washburn. Lehning said the team can learn from its team-building experience in the WNIT last season.

"It just gave us an opportunity to really come together as a team and build a lot of character," she said. "We came together. It allowed us to end the season very hungry."

Osborne returns to Nebraska as AD

The day after firing their athletic director, the University of Nebraska at Lincoln has found itself an interim AD.

Former Husker's football head coach Tom Osborne has decided to take over the athletic department on an open-ended arrangement.

"I've spent the majority of my life working with the Athletic Department at the university and I want to do what I can at this point to continue in the pursuit of excellence that has been previously established,"

Osborne said.

While serving as Nebraska's head football coach his team won three national championships, 12 Big Eight titles, and one Big 12 championship. His overall record was 255-49-3. He left Nebraska in 1997.

After his coaching career, he became a congressman for the Nebraska's 3rd Congressional District.

Osborne is replacing Steve Pederson. Pederson has served as athletic director since 2002.

Colorado Rockies make it to the World Series for first time

The Colorado Rockies are heading to the World Series for the first time in their short 14-year history.

After beating the Arizona Diamondbacks 6-4 on Monday in the National League Championship Series the Rockies secured its second straight sweep in the playoffs. In the first round they swept the Philadelphia Phillies 3-0.

The Rockies now have won 21 of 22 games to end the regular season and the playoffs. They are currently on a 10-game win streak.

They finished the regular season on a hot streak winning 14 of 15 games, and they snuck into the playoffs with a 9-8 victory over the San Diego Padres in a play-in game. Their last loss was on Sept. 28.

Matt Holliday, a native of Stillwater, Okla., was named NLCS Most Valuable Player. In the series he hit 5-for-15 with two homers and four RBIs. In the final game, he hit a three-run homer to put the Rockies up 6-1 against the Diamondbacks.

The last and only other time a team has started the playoffs with seven straight wins was in 1976, when the Cincinnati Reds did it. Before these victories, the Rockies only had one other playoff victory against the Atlanta Braves in 1995.

The Rockies possibly could face the Boston Red Sox or the Cleveland Indians in the World Series.

consumer goods and services, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics Web site.

The Economics Club has released its annual SPI since 2002. Kuester said the data each year has reflected the effect inflation has on students.

"Some inflation is an indicator that the economy is healthy," he said, "but really high inflation is a burden on consumers, and it can create some inefficiencies. I think we're getting a pretty good indicator of how K-Staters are being affected by inflation."

While the indexes include energy and food prices, the Federal Reserve excludes the two prices in its core inflation. The Federal Reserve excludes the prices in its calculation because they are not responsive to monetary policy and interest rates, Kuester said.

"The Fed is trying to control inflation to a certain degree with monetary policy and changing interest rates," Kuester said.

ster said. "Food prices and energy prices tend to be not completely immune but largely based on outside forces that the Fed doesn't feel like they can control."

Economics Club President Ed Chesny said the SPI is not as simple as just typing prices into a spreadsheet. Club members conducted research about the prices and weighed the numbers based on a student's average semester budget of $7,500, Chesny, senior in economics, said.

Several new prices were added to the index this year, including ICAT combo tickets, Internet service, iPods and sorority and fraternity housing costs, Kuester said. He also said the additions will improve next year's index when 2008 prices are compared to those collected this year.

"One of the problems that is discussed with the Consumer Price Index is that the bundle tends to be pretty stagnant and doesn't really change," Kuester said. "We want to reflect student tastes and preferences. We're just trying to keep up with the times."

Ben Mooneyham, Economics Club vice president, has worked with the SPI for three years and said it is an interesting and practical project for economics students to apply principles learned in the classroom.

Mooneyham, junior in economics and philosophy, also said students might make possible adjustments to their budgets because of the price increases reflected in the SPI.

"The student price index is one generalized way for them to look at how things they spend money on is rising," he said. "It's a way to see where their money is going and to be able to make decisions on how to change their budgetary decisions. It'll be interesting to see if students see this data and whether they decide to make substitution decisions."

bodies."

She showed statistics of the obesity rate in the United States from past years to today. She said young people today are not as healthy as they could be.

"They don't walk," Owens-Nauslar said. "Twenty-five percent of them smoke, and they drink an excessive amount."

She joked that house cleaning is the leading cause of heart disease and said people should dedicate themselves 100 percent to starting a healthy lifestyle.

"I do not clean our house," she said. "My husband does, and guess who has had two heart attacks and problems with their heart? Him, not me."

She said women should get their cholesterol and blood pressure checked, eat healthier, exercise more and have an accountability partner to keep them in check.

Mary Sue Moore, volunteer for Go Red for Women said "Ladies Night Out" also is a way for women to learn about their individual health status.

"This event is an education for women about heart disease, but we hide it through fun things like chocolate, wine, and auctions," Moore said.

Michelle Geering, regional director for Go Red for Women said women should learn the statistics of heart disease.

"One in two women die of heart disease, where one in 30 die of breast cancer," Geering said.

"Women think of heart disease as more of a male-dominated disease, and that needs to change."

She said the money raised from donations and the auction go to heart research in Kansas and the K-State Cancer Research Center.

HALLOWEEN IN MANHATTAN

Christopher Hanewinkel / JEFFREY M. HARRIS

Scary movies a cheap alternative

If you're too old to trick-or-treat, too poor to hit up the bars and too lazy to put on a costume, watching a scary movie is a great way to spend Halloween night.

If you get tired of "Halloween" and "The Simpsons Treehouse of Horror" marathons, here are some horror flicks from various genres that should satisfy your craving.

"Event Horizon"

Movie reviews by Brendan Praeger

This 1997 horror film was tragically overlooked when it originally came out. It had the misfortune of hitting theaters a few weeks after the original "Men In Black," so most science fiction fans were either watching Will Smith shoot bugs or searching the Internet for "Star Wars: Episode I" spoilers.

When I saw this film for the first time, at the ripe old age of 12, it scared the hell out of me.

I actually went into the film expecting an action movie, so this, a film that has been compared to both "Alien" and "Hellraiser," really caught me by surprise.

The film, set in 2047, follows a group of astronauts sent to investigate and salvage the lost starship "Event Horizon." The ship, able to travel faster than the speed of light, had disappeared seven years earlier while on its maiden voyage.

Director Paul W.S. Anderson is best known for "AVP: Alien vs. Predator" and adaptations of the "Resident Evil" and "Mortal Kombat" video games. This is probably his best work, as it surpasses the gimmicks of his other films to become genuinely creepy.

Laurence Fishburne and Sam Neill turn in predictably good performances, and the emptiness of space provides a good backdrop for the posessed spaceship.

"Dawn of the Dead (2004)"

If there is one horror sub-genre more prolific than zombie films, it's horror remakes.

The recent trend of mostly terrible updates has peed on the graves of numerous horror classics.

Luckily, this update does little to tarnish the memory of George A. Romero's 1978 horror classic.

Director Zack Snyder ("300") avoids the mistakes of other horror remakes by making the film his own.

Rather than simply re-filming an old script with new actors, he turns the zombies from wandering corpses into relentless monsters who are hell-bent on eating the living.

The film follows a nurse, a policeman, a gang member and other survivors of a worldwide plague as they take refuge in a Midwestern shopping mall.

They eventually try to reach a nearby lake after supplies run low.

From the title sequence featuring Johnny Cash's "When the Man Comes Around," to the gruesome home video footage that runs through the credits, this is one of the best modern horror films.

"The Nightmare Before Christmas"

If you're spending the holiday with younger viewers, or even just the faint of heart, a couple of gruesome, R-rated films might not be the best choice.

If you want to enjoy the Halloween theme, but you also want to avoid the simplicity of "Scooby-Doo" and "Ernest Scared Stupid," the best solution is Tim Burton's "The Nightmare Before Christmas."

In the film, Jack Skellington, the pumpkin king of Halloweentown, grows tired of doing the same thing every year for Halloween. One day he stumbles into Christmas Town, and is so taken with the idea of Christmas that he tries to get the resident bats, ghouls and goblins of Halloweentown to help him put on Christmas instead of Halloween. After kidnapping Santa and delivering shrunken heads to children, he realizes it might be best to stick with his original holiday.

The film, based on a Tim Burton poem, benefits from his art direction. Even though it's animated, and directed by Henry Selick ("James and the Giant Peach,") it's unmistakably a Burton film. It also has an excellent soundtrack, courtesy of Danny Elfman.

If you haven't seen this yet, you can actually go to the theater and catch it in 3-D starting Oct. 30.

You can also watch it again for Christmas without feeling out of place.

Q & A: WITH A HALLOWEEN ENTHUSIAST

Maya Pettit-Scott couldn't be more excited about the month of October. A fifth-year student in nutritional sciences and pre-medicine, Pettit-Scott said Halloween is her favorite holiday of the year, and she can think of plenty reasons why. This year, like every other year since her childhood, she will don a festive costume and hit the streets with her buddies.

Why do you love Halloween?

I love Halloween, number one because I love the fall, and I love the fall because of the leaves. And I also love just dressing up. Anything that is tied to Halloween... I love it.

What is your favorite aspect of Halloween?

I don't know if I could give you a favorite... I love the candy aspect of it, and I wish I could still trick-or-treat, because I totally would. I just love seeing other people's creativity in their Halloween outfits and going around seeing people you wouldn't expect to dress up, dress up.

Who have you seen dress up for Halloween that you didn't expect to see?

Well, my friend Laura freshman year. I didn't think she was a crazy girl and she dressed up as a pregnant, white-trash person. It just really surprised me. There are those people who really go all out for Halloween.

What was the best or most creative costume you have ever worn?

Last year, I was a can of Coca-Cola. I love Coca-Cola, so I was pretty excited about that. I made a pop-tab hat and dressed all in red. That was by far my favorite. The Marge Simpson costume was good, but the best was the can of Coke.

What is the best costume you have ever seen on someone else?

I saw someone dressed as an upside-down person. His hands were his legs, and he made a face at the bottom of his legs, and had handshoes. That was pretty awesome. He looked like he was standing upside-down but he wasn't.

What is your favorite memory of Halloween in college?

Junior year, I dressed up as Hermione from Harry Potter, and went out with my friends to Aggieville. It was the weekend before Halloween, so no one else was dressed up. It was pretty funny that we were the only people hanging around Aggieville for like four hours. We got a lot of compliments and free drinks for that.

What is your favorite Halloween memory from elementary school?

In fifth grade, my friends and I all dressed up as hippies with the bellbottoms, tie-dye shirts, headbands... It was the first year our parents let us go out on our own, so we went to the neighborhood where they gave out full-sized candy bars. So we stocked up on the candy.

What was the worst Halloween you have experienced?

My senior year of high school I moved to a new state and I didn't have any friends. I worked on Halloween, and didn't get a chance to celebrate it. That was my worst Halloween.

What do you plan to dress up as this Halloween?

I think I'm going to go for the pumpkin side of Halloween because it's classic. That's just one of my ideas right now, but I'm still trying to figure it out because I still haven't had any new inspiration for that yet. But I'm leaning towards the pumpkin.

What do you plan to do this Halloween?

My friends and I are going to have our annual Halloween dinner at our house where we make dishes that remind us of fall and watch scary movies. Then we'll probably go out to Aggieville on Halloween night, wear our costumes, and see what other people are wearing. So those are my big plans for Halloween.

Where do you think is the most popular place to go at K-State for Halloween?

I would say Rusty's because they always have a contest for the best costume. I like to go there because I like to see other people's costumes. But Aggieville in general [is a popular place to go] if you're over 21.

What are you most excited for this year?

Just a night off from school, hanging out with my friends and being silly. That's what I most enjoy about it -- just relaxing, getting to dress up in a character and getting to act like you're five again.

The best costume selections can be found at Hot Topic and Halloween Boutique in the Manhattan Town Center, and Rockstar & Rogers, 715 N. 12th Street. Other stores like Mr. P's Party Outlet, 318 Poyntz Ave., and Wal-Mart, 101 E. Bluemont Ave., offer smaller but less expensive collections.

Hot Topic is known for its edgier clothing and product line, and come October, store manager Christy Cowling said the shop goes all-out.

"I feel like this is our favorite holiday," Cowling said. "Our company adores Halloween."

Hot Topic offers a large selection of elaborate and over-the-top costumes, but with more variety for women than men.

The store has men's and women's packaged costumes — costumes that include accessories — which Cowling said are extremely well-made. Costumes at Hot Topic are a little more pricey, but Cowling said customers get what they pay for.

"The quality is there for the price," she said. "The fit is very flattering, and they're going to look better than they would in a plastic, vinyl, cheap one. Plus, our friendly, knowledgeable staff is ready to help you find every component for your costume."

These components include: wigs, swords, hats, shoes, boots, make-up, masks, wings and more. Although Hot Topic does not rent costumes, Cowling said customers will leave more than satisfied with their purchases.

To rent a costume for a night or two, head over to Rock Star & Rogers. Store co-owner, Rebecca Christensen, said its customers pay a fee of $20 or more, depending on the value, to rent a costume for a negotiated period of time.

She said customers must also pay a deposit for the retail price of the costume, which they are refunded upon return.

This is to guarantee a return on-time. Christensen said R&R does charge late and damage fees, but she said it's not typically a problem.

The store offers packaged costumes as well as vintage single items. Christensen said the store also is having a big sale on costumes being retired from the store because, "they are not in great shape anymore." These sale items are mostly build-yourself costumes.

Christensen said the store is still waiting for its final men's shipment, so the majority of its costumes are for women.

However, the store does have a few giant, furry animal suits, pimp costumes, wigs, beards and hats and also a variety of tights and stockings.

But the largest Halloween store in town with the greatest costume variety is Halloween Boutique. A college-oriented store, Halloween Boutique has wall after wall of men's and women's costumes, wigs, masks, shoes and props.

"We have a lot to choose from, and we really don't have anything that's overpriced," said sales associate Shauna Nelson. "We're geared toward college students, especially in the men's department."

"Families don't appreciate it quite as much as the college kids do," she said with a chuckle.

Wal-Mart has a smaller, less expensive selection of costumes, and Mr. P's Party Outlet provides a number of cheap costume accessories such as boas, garters, doctor and police kits, fake piercing jewelry and hats.

Yet, some students prefer to create their costumes rather than rent or purchase them.

"You gotta be original," said Kelly Krob, fifth-year senior in architecture. "Your costume should be different from everybody else's. I could never see myself going out and buying a costume."

This Halloween, Krob bought a bucket of blue liquid latex paint online. He said he plans to slather himself with the paint and become a member of the Blue Man Group, a rhythm percussion performance group, this season.

Krob said he is a drummer and has been in a few "trash can bands" similar to the Blue Man Group, which is how he got the costume idea.

With some black clothes, a pair of blue gloves, a swimmer's cap to simulate a bald head and a little latex paint, Krob will transform himself from an ordinary K-State student to an extraordinary member of the Blue Man Group for the price of a can of paint.

So no matter what you dream up this year, rest assured you'll be able to find the perfect costume for your long list of parties to complete your Halloween festivities.

Businesses, family farms have wide selection of pumpkins

By Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As the fall season has begun, several pumpkin stands can be found throughout Manhattan. Britt's Farm, located on Scenic Drive north of Fort Riley Boulevard, offers a variety of pumpkins and other fall foliage.

"At our farm, students can have a great fall experience," said Angela Britt, who owns the family farm with her husband. Britt. "They can pick a pumpkin, go to our bonfire site or walk through the corn maze."

Britt's Farm sells pumpkins, shucks of corn and other fresh vegetables. The pumpkin patch is open during September and October. Also, they sell homemade pies and other baked goods. Britt, senior in business management, said the farm grows all its pumpkins on 80 acres of land. The average cost is $2-$4 per pumpkin.

Britt said the cost depends on the weight of the pumpkin.

Gary King, assistant produce manager at Dillon's, said his pumpkins were looking good and the average weight was 5-14 pounds.

"We are really putting a big emphasis on selling as many pumpkins as we can," King said. "We are trying to get them out of our warehouse in Hutchinson."

King said most of their pumpkins are grown in Kansas and the surrounding states.

King also said October is prime pumpkin supply in the United States. At Dillon's, customers can buy three pumpkins for $10.

Thesa Petty, manager of Eastside Market, said it has pie pumpkins, mini pumpkins and apprentice pumpkins, which are between the size of a large pumpkin and a small pumpkin.

There prices range from 39 to 59 cents per pound.

"We probably have more variety and the largest selection of anyone in town," Petty said.

Kelly Byczkowski, junior in architecture, bought a pumpkin during fall break at Eastside Market.

Byczkowski said she usually shops around for produce but thought the pumpkin price at Eastside Market was a good deal. She said the market had a pumpkin display outside so she decided to pull over.

"I love the fall holidays and Halloween," she said. "It's a tradition with my family to always get pumpkins."

All pumpkins and other vegetables are raised on 80 acres of Britt's Farm, 1400 S. Scenic Drive. Pumpkins are actually a fruit or a large melon. They are believed to have originated in North America.

Campaign scheduled to reach goal

By Amanda Keim
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's Changing Lives Campaign has raised about 97 percent of its total goal with about eight months until its end.

The Changing Lives Campaign began in July 2000 with the intent of raising $500 million for K-State student scholarships and programs, recruiting and retaining faculty and technology infrastructure.

In its efforts to meet this goal, the campaign has scoured the country in search of individuals who want to make a difference for K-State and has raised more than $480 million as of June 30.

The United States was divided into seven regions, and each region was assigned volunteer leaders and committees. A professional fund-raising team from KSU Foundation also supports each of these designated areas to enhance productivity.

A decrease in state funding provided to the university is one of the principal reasons for conducting this campaign. Tresa Weaver, senior director of University Campaigns, said the effects of decreased funding are apparent in higher tuition costs, and she said she thinks this campaign will allow K-State to remain financially strong.

"We are a state-funded institution," Weaver said. "Continually we see a decrease in our total budget or what we get from the state. That's the increased need for private gifts—to continue to run our university at the level we all expect."

The Changing Lives Campaign works with the All-University Campaign as well as K-State PROUD, which allows students to get involved in aiding the university.

This year, the All-University Campaign has been the most successful branch of Changing Lives. Of the 23 groups in the All-University Campaign, only three have not exceeded their fund-raising goal.

"We've got statistics that show that this year we are way, way ahead of last year," said Gary Mortenson, All-University Campaign co-chair and head of the Department of Music. "Our whole effort has been towards participation and not specific dollar amounts. We just want people to participate."

Mortenson said one of the leading reasons for participation by faculty this year is the benefits they can see in their individual departments. Donated funds can be directed to whichever department a person wants them to be sent.

"I think the reason is pure and simple," Mortenson said. "I think we got the right message out and the message is this: the money I give to K-State is very special to me because I see it at work. I go to the school everyday, and I see the difference. I think once people start seeing that, then they start to get passionate as well."

Passion for the campaign can be felt even in its name. During a brainstorming session that took place in 2000, Weaver said many volunteers chose the title of the Changing Lives Campaign to reflect their views on their college experiences.

"What we heard from volunteers was for people, their university experience changed their life," Weaver said. "If they hadn't had that, they'd be somewhere very different today, and the ones who realize that are most likely to want to

Manhattan resident updates century-old downtown clock

By Brandon Steinert
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

During the past few days, downtown shoppers might have noticed a man hanging out the window at the top of the Riley County Courthouse clock tower.

David Seay, a Manhattan resident, has spent more time than he usually does, climbing up the rickety old stairs to the clock, where he can see all the way to Anderson Hall's bell tower. Instead of his weekly trips up the winding stairs to the clock, he has been working extra hours to finish a full make-over of the 100-year-old clock.

Seay said his love of clocks started when he was doing his laundry dry many years ago.

"It was 30 years ago when I met a 70-year-old man named George Hampton in a laundromat in Aggieville," Seay said. "I spoke with him for a while, and he said 'you should come see my clocks.' So I did. I went to his house, and we walked into the basement where it sounded just like rain because of all the ticking from the many clocks. It was love at first sight."

Most people just know him as the guy who works on the courthouse clock, but Seay said during the past few years, he has worked on clocks all around the country.

"This has been my only source of income for 30 years," Seay said.

See CLOCKTOWER, Page 10

Seay uses a variety of tools to complete the project of updating and improving the courthouse clock tower downtown.

Community helped repair clock

The Riley County Courthouse was built in 1906, and the clock was built one year later, with the help of several community members.

Cheryl Collins, director of the Riley County Historical Museum, said the Manhattan community has always been involved with the clock.

"One of the things I think is interesting about the clock is that from the very beginning it was a community project," she said.

Today, 100 years after it was built, the community is helping to restore the clock again. Collins said the city received a grant from the Heri-tag Trust Fund and the county commission has matched that amount, but any additional costs of the project will depend on public fundraising.

Leadership not a rarity but requires vision, K-State president says

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One person can make a difference in a leadership role, said President Jon Wefald Wednesday morning in McCain Auditorium.

"Leadership is not necessarily a rare skill," Wefald said. "Indeed, most people can become very significant leaders in a variety of professions. A person's IQ doesn't necessarily have a lot to do with whether he will become an outstanding leader."

Wefald spoke as part of the College of Business Administration's Distinguished Lecture Series, which Commerce Bank and the William T. Kemper Foundation sponsored. He is the first university president to present a business administration distinguished lecture.

Wefald cited the late writer, management consultant and university professor Peter Drucker during the lecture. Wefald said Drucker emphasized leaders should always ask "What needs to be done?" rather than "What am I going to do?"

During his 21-year presidency, Wefald has received national recognition for improving K-State athletics and academics. When he came to K-State in mid 1986, he said he listened to needs addressed from K-State faculty, staff, students, alumni, the Kansas Board of Regents and Kansas legislators.

"When I came to Kansas State in 1986, I did not come with a preordained strategy," Wefald said. "I had never, ever stepped foot in the state of Kansas. So I knew I had to listen."

The first 500 attendees at Wefald's lecture Wednesday morning received a copy of "A University Renaissance: Jon Wefald's Presidency at Kansas State" by Robert J. Shoop, K-State professor of educational law and a senior scholar in K-State's Leadership Studies and Programs.

Wefald said he follows eight characteristics for excellent leadership, each of which is discussed in "A University Renaissance." The characteristics are as follows: have a vision and develop a game plan; communicate your vision; hire excellent people and delegate authority and responsibility; make decisions and take risks; admit mistakes and apologize when necessary; be trustworthy and care about others; never give up; and have a sense of humor.

Many people often look at the leadership characteristics and claim they practice and understand them, Wefald said.

"But the truth is they don't practice them. I do," Wefald said. "It isn't just theoretical to me. I take the principles in this book and put them into practice. I guess that's why I'm still here after 20 years."

President Jon Wefald speaks to attendees during the College of Business Administration's Distinguished Lecture Series Wednesday morning in the Hemisphere Room of Hale Library.

Crosswalk buttons aid pedestrian safety, especially at night

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students are starting to take notice and push the crosswalk light buttons around campus, more than one year after their installation.

Student Body President Matt Wagner said Student Governing Association members decided to have the lights installed on campus because several SGA members had seen similar lights about three years ago on other campuses and liked the idea that they were placed where students must be easily seen.

So far this semester, all of the campus crosswalk lights have been working, and many students have been using them prior to crossing the street.

"I think that they have definitely put safety on campus and have decreased people being hit by vehicles," said Wagner, senior in management information systems.

Wagner said SGA members are trying to find the best approach to promoting the use of the crosswalk signal buttons.

"We need to do more to have students push those buttons," Wagner said.

He said it took a while to decide on the lights because SGA members working on the project were presented with two different types of lights they could install on campus.

Wagner said, at the time, they were negotiating in-ground lighting and the current lighting on campus.

Student Body Vice President Lydia Peele said the in-ground lighting was not chosen because it was more expensive and less lights would have been installed.

Peele, senior in education and mathematics, also said SGA members found through their research that other cities that installed the in-ground lighting had experienced various problems with the systems.

Peele said the crosswalk lights were a part of the proposal for the city/university fund in which SGA chooses items to assist the campus and the city of Manhattan.

About $65,000 was requested for sidewalk lighting and crosswalk improvements last year, Peele said.

She said having the crosswalk lights is a good addition to the campus, because they provide more safety for students to walk during the night and day.

She said she hopes students will press the buttons more, especially at night, because it is difficult for drivers to see pedestrians crossing the street.

Peele said SGA members have talked about putting up signs so students will be re-

Outside Goodnow Hall on Denison Avenue is one of the crosswalks equipped with a light system, which is designed to make crossing traffic safer on campus streets.

minded to push the button for the crosswalk lights.

"We constantly are looking for ways for our campus to be more safe," Peele said.

Janna Cullop, sophomore in agricultural communications and journalism, said when the lights were not working and were not placed yet, it was intimidating to cross streets at night, because she was worried about oncoming traffic not being able to see her.

"I have seen a lot of people almost hit," Cullop said. "It was not safe."

Cullop said she uses the crosswalk lights all the time since their installation and repair.

She said she now feels more comfortable walking on campus, especially at night.

Cullop also said drivers will stop if they see the blinking crosswalk light.

"I see more people using them, and I think that people are starting to get used to using them," Cullop said. "They definitely work."

Marta Johnson, sophomore in construction science, said she likes to use the lights, but sometimes she fails to do so because she thinks it is a hassle to walk over and push the button.

She said she uses them more at night, because it is more dangerous to walk in the dark, but she thinks cars still are not aware of the flashing lights.

"Sometimes cars really don't pay attention to the lights or pedestrians," she said. "It is a problem drivers have and can't really be fixed."

Makers of Manhattan Visitors' Guide win 11th consecutive state award

By Jelani Yancey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Travel Industry Association of Kansas recently awarded top honors to the marketing team that designed the Manhattan Visitors' Guide.

"Manhattan won the gold for best developed in-house travelbook," said Dick Carter, executive director for TIAK. This marks the 11th consecutive year Manhattan has won the award, he said.

About 170 people attended the Kansas Tourism Conference on Oct. 2 in Topeka, Carter said. The annual conference, run by TIAK, provides leaders in the Kansas travel and tourism industry the opportunity to get together and exchange ideas. This year's conference featured the theme "Celebrating the past, creating the future," Carter said.

The Manhattan Convention and Visitors' Bureau prints 100,000 copies of the guidebook every year and places them throughout Kansas—in hotels, travel kiosks and the K-State Alumni Center. They also are available in cities with colleges in the Big 12 Conference, said Dennis Toll, tourism sales manager at the bureau.

"It's one of our major vehicles to get information out to visitors of Manhattan," Toll said.

The guide features blurbs on activities, attractions, lodging and restaurants in Manhattan. In the guide, Kansas' tourists can read about attractions like McCain Auditorium, the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, the Strecker-Nelson Art Gallery and K-State sports, Toll said.

"One book's got all the information," he said.

Dena Huff, communications manager for the bureau, designs a new layout for the guidebook every year. This year, the book was created with a "Get connected" theme and featured many pictures to enhance the information presented, Huff said.

"Pictures always tell the story of everything. That's what visitors want to see," she said.

New guidebooks are available every Jan. 1.

Huff's layout and theme makes the guidebook attractive and helps visitors access information easily, Toll said.

"Our visitors like that," he said. "If they're in town and looking for a place to eat, this makes it easy for them."

Martha Slater, a charter member of TIAK, served on a panel of three judges who examined and scored all the submissions. Manhattan's guide scored high marks because it seemed clean, professional and unique, Slater said.

"Everybody's trying to get their story out; some do it in a unique way, and some don't," said Slater, president of First Generation Video, a firm that produces promotional and educational videos, TV commercials and community marketing.

TIAK also handed out awards in the following categories: outsourced visitors' guide design, print advertisements, promotional campaign, promotional brochure, promotional video, promotional event, community-education program, public service announcement, in-house and outsourced Web site design and a people's choice award, Carter said.

"The visitor guide is considered the top award," he said.

Tourism in Kansas accounted for $5.6 billion in revenue in 2004, the latest year for which TIAK has compiled tourism statistics.

Approximately 167,000 people are employed in travel-related businesses, including hotels, restaurants and tourist attractions, Carter said.

TO THE POINT

Wefald has credentials of a U.S. president

After Wefald's speech on leadership Wednesday, the Collegian decided to make a list of the different aspects that would make Jon Wefald a great candidate for the presidency of the United States of America.

We realize there is no way he will run for the highest public office, but we wanted to have fun with it anyway.

Since his arrival at our university, Wefald has increased enrollment. Past presidents were content to let our numbers slide lower and lower, but when Wefald got here, he did something about it and increased our enrollment to the highest total in K-State's history.

What group in our nation needs an increase in enrollment? That's right, the military. If he can make joining the Armed Forces as much fun and attractive as he made enrolling at K-State, the government would not have to worry about low military numbers ever again.

Also, he has been here for 20 years. That proves he's dedicated to the office he holds.

What other president has shown dedication to the office as the nation's leader? Franklin Delano Roosevelt. FDR was so committed to the position, it took death to remove him from office. That's the kind of dedication we need from the leader of the free world.

Wefald also turned around a football program that was the laughing stock of the nation.

Our country needs a turnaround like that. Our country needs Jon Wefald.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Democrats halt war efforts with antiquated, useless bill

Hidden behind a noble stance against genocide, Democrats have made a disgraceful attempt to end the war in Iraq. In a vote of 27-21, the House Foreign Relations Committee voted to call the 1915-1923 killing of more than a million Armenians genocide.

KEVIN PHILLIPS

A National Public Radio program aired Oct. 16 explained, since the committee vote, the following has happened: Turkey, the country which 70 percent of our supplies go through before they reach U.S. troops in Iraq, is threatening to revoke our base privileges. Turkish citizens have begun protesting in the streets against the United States, and the country is threatening to invade northern Iraq and attack the Kurds.

Doesn't quite seem worth it, which begs for a question of why the U.S. Congress feels it's necessary to condemn this dark chapter in Turkey's history. This is an inadvertent way of making it harder to fight the war in Iraq. So far it has been effective, but it was much more than that; it was hypocritical and incredibly ignorant.

Democrats have not been successful in stopping the war in Iraq. With elections right around the corner, they did the next best thing — put a giant wall between the United States and one of its most strategic allies in the war. Now we understand their motive, but it is still hypocritical and a waste of time.

We have our own dark spots in history. Gregory Meeks, Democrat Congressman from New York, pointed out the lack of a House resolution condemning the violence against Native Americans by our own federal government. It is also important to note almost 100 years have passed since this genocide and Turkey technically was still the Ottoman Empire.

This resolution has created a lot of instability in the region. On Oct. 12, the Jerusalem Post reported relations between Israel and Turkey are now in jeopardy. Crude oil prices have risen from increased instability, creating an even larger burden for U.S. citizens without any reward.

History is important, but at what price is tomorrow more important than yesterday? Turkey is a key ally, and one the United States depends on as a transportation route for its troops. Taxpayers' dollars should not be spent on making it harder to get supplies to those who protect us.

Democrats in Congress pulled a purely ignorant move. If we are troubled by the massive slaughter of human life, we should be troubled by it everywhere.

In 1994, more than 800,000 Africans died in the genocide in Rwanda, and they never received such a resolution.

In 2006, the peak of the Darfur violence reached a death toll of more than 400,000 — a number that is still increasing today.

On Oct. 14, the New York Times reminded us that more than 4 million people have died in Congo since 1998. Today in Congo, thousands of women and little girls are being raped and killed by opposing forces in an attempt to end opposition forces' future growth. The death toll among all citizens continues to rise and unless they strike oil soon, there is no end — or U.S. resolution — in sight.

What happened in Turkey in 1915 was a tragedy, no question, but a resolution won't save those people. If we really want to speak out against genocide, let's start. But let's act now and not just point fingers.

Kevin Phillips is a senior in legal communication. Please send comments to opinion@spub.ksu.edu.

Falling dollar value forces students to spend more abroad

Manhattan might be a great place to live while experiencing the college life, but planes, trains and automobiles can take students to places across the globe. Students considering traveling abroad should not allow the high costs and weakening dollar to prevent them from having the trip of a lifetime.

MEGAN MOLITOR

Many students choose to study abroad in various locations to experience life as a "foreigner," and to become immersed in the culture of a beautiful country. In other countries, it can be exciting to regularly indulge in exotic foods and to take side trips to other countries just a hop, skip and jump away for next to nothing. Or at least this is how it used to be.

According to K-State's Office of International Programs, studying abroad is predicted to cost anywhere from $3,000 to $20,000. However, these costs could soon be rising, since the value of the dollar to the Euro is diminishing.

According to an article reported by MSNBC, last year, one Euro was worth $1.25. This week, the dollar has depreciated into a weaker stance against the Euro to $1.41.

While this might not be of much relevance to some, this puts college students wishing to travel abroad to Europe at a severe disadvantage.

Even everyday expenses are becoming difficult to justify. MSNBC reported that a simple cup of coffee costs four Euros in France, which equals nearly $6 in the United States. For a college student living on financial aid and parents' assistance thousands of miles away, it can be difficult to stretch money.

Studying abroad is meant to be an amazing, life-changing experience for one to bring back to share with friends and family — not a year of stress and worry about money. But when everything bought from the new country is approximately 50 percent more expensive, it would almost seem more financially intelligent to stay on a campus here in the States to save money.

The most important part of any study-abroad experience is the enhancement of one's education. However, to become fully immersed in a different culture, it is usually necessary to get out and live as the locals do, and much of the time, this can require money. Sampling new foods, visiting local landmarks, side trips and souvenirs — it all adds up. And when the money a person brings becomes less valuable in their new location, it becomes even more difficult.

Hopefully, this worrisome fact will not deter any potential travelers from spending a semester or two a continent away. There are many small things students should do to make sure their abroad experience doesn't leave them with empty pockets.

Obviously, plan ahead. With this new information regarding the Euro, students planning on traveling to Europe should start saving to have plenty of extra pocket money when they get there. Also, another tip MSNBC gave was to consider taking the time to travel to the host country early, before school starts, and work for a few months to earn extra money.

The bottom line is that the same rules apply to living overseas temporarily as in the United States — live responsibly. Go out and explore the new country, but be conscious — money might not go quite as far as it did, oh, a week ago. Whether broke or splurging on fancy French food every day, a traveling abroad experience is bound to be one thing: an amazing experience, weak dollar or not.

Archive Web site director encourages free, legal information sharing

Paul Jones, director of ibiblio.org, speaks to attendees about archive collections and the Internet during a University Distinguished Lecture Wednesday morning in the Hemisphere Room of Hale Library. Jones is an original manager of one of the first North American World Wide Web sites, and he also is a founding board member of the American Open Technology Consortium.

Archivists cultivate people over time with their distinguished collections, said an advocate for social networks and online archives Wednesday morning in the Hemisphere Room in Hale Library.

Paul Jones is the director of ibiblio.org, a digital library of public domain and creative commons media. The Web site is operated in the Office of Information Technology Service at the University of North Carolina-Chapel Hill.

"We collect the collectors," he said. "We give them as much power as we can to move forward."

The site ibiblio.org started as one of the first World Wide Web sites in North America in 1992 with Jones as its first manager. The site originally was named SunSITE.unc.edu. In 1998, the site's name changed to metatlab.unc.edu, and it changed to ibiblio in 2000.

"Archives look for interesting collections," Jones said during the site's start in 1992. "We look for interesting people creating interesting collections in interesting ways. We collect the collections and empower them."

Jones also serves as a clinical associate professor in the School of Information and Library Science at UNC-Chapel Hill. Jones authored "The Web Server Book" in 1995, and he also has written articles on issues like digital libraries and the open-source movement.

The mission of ibiblio.org is to help people who want to share information freely and legally, he said.

"What we want to promote is to allow people access to culture, to participate in the construction of historical and cultural records, to remix and reuse those materials," Jones said.

The ibiblio Web site receives more than 12 million information requests each day, and it is backed through companies like IBM, RealNetworks and VA Linux.

"It is the public's library and digital archive," said Thomas Gould, associate professor of journalism and mass communications. "I cannot think of anyone who's probably more into and aware of and an expert at the issues of archiving."

Co-Defendant says O.J. wanted armed men

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LAS VEGAS — O.J. Simpson wanted armed men with him when he confronted two sports memorabilia dealers, according to a co-defendant who has agreed to plead guilty and testify against the former football star.

"O.J. said 'Hey, just bring some firearms,'" Walter Alexander told police, according to a transcript of his tape-recorded statement obtained by The Associated Press.

Alexander told police after his arrest Sept. 15 that he and another man showed up with guns at Simpson's request, then headed with him into a casino hotel room to retrieve collectibles that Simpson said belonged to him.

Simpson told Alexander the guns were just for show, "so that these people know that, you know, we're here for business," Alexander quoted Simpson as saying.

Simpson's attorney, Yale Galanter, said Wednesday that Simpson's position remains that there were no guns brought to the room and he did not tell anyone to bring guns.

"There was no reason for Mr. Simpson to tell anyone to bring guns. He was going to see people he knew," Galanter said, adding that Alexander's statement couldn't be trusted since he was looking for lenient treatment.

Alexander, 46, told police he carried a .22-caliber handgun in his waistband and Michael McClinton, who gave him that gun, pulled a larger pistol from a holster and displayed it in the room.

Police have alleged that McClinton impersonated a law enforcement officer during the alleged robbery.

McClinton went into the room "being Mr. Tough Guy," Alexander said, adding that McClinton's behavior "made things a lot worse than they probably would've been."

VOLLEYBALL | NO. 14 K-STATE 3, TEXAS TECH 0 (30-22, 30-15, 30-14)

Martin will win without Huggins

The No. 26 basketball recruit for the class of 2009 verbally committed to K-State on Monday.

Wally Judge plays for the D.C. Assault AAU basketball team and attended Madness in Manhattan Friday evening. Judge was joined by several other D.C. Assault players.

JONATHAN POTTER

According to rivals.com, a few other schools were interested in Judge's services, including West Virginia. In case you haven't made the connection yet, Bob Huggins is losing the recruiting war.

Besides K-State and West Virginia, Judge also listed offers from Ohio State, Georgetown and Maryland. All of a sudden, K-State is pulling big-name recruits away from great basketball programs.

Based on their ability to attract top-notch recruits, coaches Frank Martin and Dalton Hill are elevating the Wildcats' basketball program without Huggins. This might come as a surprise to many media outlets and fans. Many thought Huggins was the only key, and many still do.

Apparently, Hill is the one providing the magic for K-State's recruiting efforts.

Five D.C. Assault players have committed to the Wildcats because of Hill — three after Huggins' departure.

Two of the five, Dominique Sutton and Jamar Samuels, are expected to join K-State's team for the second semester this year. According to scout.com, both have signed national letters of intent. K-State freshman Ron Anderson played for the Assault, as well as Michael Beasley, the highest-ranked Hill recruit.

So we know Martin and Hill can recruit, but can they be successful coaches without Huggins?

That is a question few could answer, maybe not even Martin, who has never been a collegiate head coach.

Former K-State coach Jim Wooldridge was a successful coach before he became a Big 12 Conference coach, but we all know what happened to him. We should all hope Martin doesn't turn into another Wooldridge, but I don't think he will. For one, Martin is already bringing in great recruits — a skill that often eluded Woody.

So even if Martin isn't necessarily a better coach, he will perform better because of who he puts on the court.

Martin's situation is comparable to Bill Snyder's original hire. No one knew what Snyder would do as K-State's coach, similar to Martin. Based upon my somewhat restricted knowledge of Martin, he and Snyder have one characteristic in common — extreme passion to succeed.

I don't think Martin can handle losing. The only real memories I have of Martin's coaching from last season are of him rocketing out of his seat to yell at someone or something. In a way, he was mimicking Huggins, perhaps looking toward his future as a head coach.

I'm not mad at Huggins. He left K-State with the foundation it needs to become a basketball superpower. Sure, K-State probably would have been better off if he was still here, but I'm looking forward to watching Martin write his story.

Huggins was Cincinnati's coach, not K-State's.

Martin will turn into the Wildcats' coach, and hopefully by the time he retires, his story will be almost as great as Snyder's.

Cats win, coach expects better play

By Jonathan Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coach Suzie Fritz said she didn't like the way the Wildcats played Wednesday night at all.

"I didn't feel like we handled little details well," Fritz said. "We have to play to the best of our ability every time. I felt like we were a little complacent tonight."

What might be surprising after that comment is that the 14th-ranked K-State volleyball team swept Texas Tech 3-0 (30-22, 30-15, 30-14) at Ahearn Field House.

Five Wildcats hit more than 400, led by junior middle blocker Megan Farr, who converted nine kills on 12 attacks. As a team, K-State hit .449, while they held the Red Raiders to .049 hitting.

The Wildcats dominated Texas Tech statistically, but Fritz's team has accepted her high expectations and was not feeling great by any means.

"We need to put the hammer on them and keep the pressure all the way through," senior libero Angie Lastra said. "Maybe not by statistics, but just effort-wise, we need to take care of those details that don't appear in statistics."

Junior outside hitter Nataly Korobkova led K-State's attack, finishing with 16 kills on .500 hitting. Freshman Julianne Chisholm recorded a career-high eight kills on 13 attacks.

Though Fritz was not pleased with the overall performance, she made it clear she was happy to get the win and was also pleased with some defensive plays.

"We'll take ugly wins anytime," Fritz said. "Defensively, our block was one of the bright spots. When our block was touching balls, our defense did a nice job of running balls down."

K-State finished with five team blocks, led by sophomore Kelsey Chipman, who chalked up one solo block and three block assists. Chipman also tallied nine kills on .583 hitting.

The Wildcats' victory moves them to 15-5 overall and 7-3 in Big 12 Conference play.

Texas Tech continues to struggle this season, having won just one of its 10 Big 12 matches. The Red Raiders move to 7-12 overall.

K-State continued its streak of 275 matches with one or more aces. Lauren Mathewson led the Wildcats with two and Jenny Jantsch added one.

The match lasted just 79 minutes, but the Wildcats were able to notch 59 kills as a team. Texas Tech never led in the match but tied the score three times.

K-State will face No. 23 Oklahoma Friday in Norman, Okla. Play is scheduled to begin at 6 p.m.

Junior guard Kelsey Nelson transferred to K-State from Cloud County Community College in Concordia, Kan. She is the younger sister of senior wide receiver Jordy Nelson. The siblings share similarities including athletic performance and post-collegiate plans.

Nelson siblings reunite after different paths to K-State

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

He is the leading wide receiver for K-State's football team. She is a junior college transfer who is now on the K-State women's basketball team. They share not only their athletic talent, but a last name — Nelson.

Kelsey, a junior, came to K-State after two years at Cloud County Community College in Concordia, Kan., while Jordy, a senior, came to K-State directly from high school at nearby Riley County High School.

"I figured if I was going to go to it, I was going to do it the right way," Jordy said of choosing K-State. "I wanted to go to a big-time program and see what could happen. I didn't want to go to a smaller school and have the what-ifs that I wouldn't have if I were at a Division I school."

Although both siblings ended up here, they weren't always K-State fans. During their childhood, an aunt who lived in Clearwater, Kan., convinced them to root for the Jayhawks.

"The majority of the family were K-State fans, so we were the outcasts," Jordy said. "Our aunt was a KU fan, and she brain-washed us at a young age."

Kelsey said Jordy was always the bigger KU fan.

"In his room, from his bedding to the clocks to the pillows to everything on the walls were Jayhawks," Kelsey said. "He would even come to the football camps here, and the checks that he paid for the camps with were even KU. Him coming to K-State was a pretty big change."

Both were stand-out athletes at Riley County High School. Jordy, who was a quarterback and defensive back in high school, was named first-team 3A quarterback by the Topeka Capital-Journal. Kelsey still holds the scoring record on the basketball team. When it came time to choose a school, Jordy was wavering between Emporia, Washburn and K-State. But after choosing K-State, he said he didn't put any pressure on Kelsey to follow in his footsteps.

"I left it up to her," he said. "I wanted her to go where she wanted to go, and I didn't want to put any pressure on her. She made the decision she wanted to make and hopefully she made the right one and she'll enjoy it."

"When I was making my decision, he just wanted to make me realize that it was going to be a lot of work, and I was going to have to be dedicated to it and determined to do my best," Kelsey said. "Both of us knew going into it knew that I would do that. Then he just laid back and was a brother for me."

After Jordy Nelson decided to come to K-State, he said he didn't put any pressure on his sister to come as well. However, K-State is the school she selected to attend after she transferred from Cloud County.

In the three years since Jordy came to K-State, Kelsey said her name has been associated with his a lot, especially in the last two years. She said she has been proud of his accomplishments.

"He's earned it, and he's worked hard to get where he is," she said. "I'm fine with his name being with mine because I'm proud of what he's done and hopefully he'll be proud of what I do."

Both Jordy and Kelsey also have similar post-collegiate aspirations. Jordy is majoring in secondary education, while Kelsey is an elementary education major. Both said they hope to coach after college.

Both said the support of having family 20 miles away has been important, from the convenience in going home to having family members visit them.

Holmes to suit up for Sunday's game

Chiefs running back Priest Holmes practiced on Wednesday for the first time since a 2005 head and neck injury.

The Chiefs traded running back Michael Bennett on Tuesday, leaving the backup position behind Larry Johnson open. That increased speculation of Holmes playing Sunday against the Oakland Raiders.

Holmes "will put the pads on. He will put the helmet on. Whether he participates in the [Oakland] game or not, we'll see how practice goes," said head coach Herm Edwards.

Holmes turned 34 this month and is a three-time Pro Bowler. He was injured on Oct. 30, 2005, when he took a hit from Shawne Merriman.

Holmes was put on the physically-unable-to-perform list, but had a dream in which he claimed he saw himself playing football. That dream took him to this year's training camp in River Falls, Wis.

He appears to have lost about 10 pounds since July.

Indians one win away from first World Series since 1997

The question remains, who is going to play the Colorado Rockies in the World Series?

It is down to the Boston Red Sox and the Cleveland Indians in the American League Championship Series. The Indians are leading the Red Sox three games to one in the seven-game series.

On Tuesday the Indians defeated the Red Sox 7-3. The Indians scored seven runs in the fifth inning. Their pitcher Paul Byrd was able to hold off the Red Sox long enough for the fifth inning outburst.

The Indians haven't been to the World Series since 1997 and haven't won the title since '48 when they beat the Boston Braves. The last time the city of Cleveland had any sort of pro sport championship was in 1964 when the Browns won in football.

The Red Sox won the World Series in 2004 when they swept the St. Louis Cardinals. It was their first title since 1918.

Boston took the first game of this year's ALCS, but the Indians have won three straight, and tonight's game will be in Cleveland.

The projected starters for the game are C.C. Sabathia for Cleveland and Josh Beckett, who beat the Indians in game one, for Boston.

"To be in a position to put us in the World Series is unbelievable," Sabathia said. "I'm going to go out and have fun."

Objective-based game defined by teamwork, use of strategy

By Andy Heintz
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Running through the woods toting an air-powered toy rifle is a typical Sunday afternoon for members of the K-State Airsoft Team.

Two teams compete against each other at 11:30 a.m. Sundays on 23 acres of land near Tuttle Creek State Park.

According to the group's official Web site, airsoft is a tactical simulation game played with air rifles shooting 6 mm plastic pellets at high velocities to complete a mission-based tactical scenario.

Brent Keltner, senior in social science, is a member of the team and enjoys the thrill of the game, which is often compared to paintball.

"There is no experience like it," Keltner said. "The only thing more real life than airsoft is military combat."

Two teams compete in the game, and the winner is the team with the most points. Points are earned by completing primary and secondary objectives. Examples of typical game-play scenarios are attack and defend, capture the flag and rescuing a hostage.

President of the club Greg Payne, junior in mechanical engineering, said the team uses a variety of military tactics in its games.

"As far as looks go, our weapons are similar to military weapons," Payne said.

When team members in airsoft are shot, they must wave deadrags - shop rags with knots tied in all four corners - to show everyone they are out of action. People can immediately return with help from a medic. To heal a teammate, the medic has to untie the four knots on the dead rag.

Payne said in a typical airsoft game, there will be a medic for every three or four people on a team. If a person is shot while they are out of action, they must go back to their team's base. Depending on the scenario, this person can return to action after they reach the base, or they must wait for another member of their team to return to the base before they are allowed back in the game.

"I love the honesty, the team building aspect and the rush of it all," Payne said.

Vice president Nick Massiman, junior in architecture, said players must wear goggles that have been tested to withstand projectiles like paintballs and plastic pellets to compete in airsoft. The goggles also must be sealed so no BBs can get under them.

Massiman said camaraderie is an important part of the game.

"It really helps to build teamwork and learn how each other thinks and reacts during certain situations," he said.

Payne said the group has about 17 members this year. This is an increase from the previous year, when the team had about 11 members.

nior in accounting, said many members joined after the airsoft group sponsored a table at the activities fair.

To become an official member of the team, players must attend three Sunday events. They are provided with guns, uniforms and goggles for the first three or four weeks. After this period has ended, new members must buy their own equipment and weapons.

Members of the team dress in camouflage, and many members purchase their outfits at a surplus store in Junction City called Military Outlet.

At the store, there are uniforms made by Milspec, the company that designs uniforms for the U.S. military.

Most members of the team purchase their air gun rifles on the Internet.

Team captain John Ellison, junior in mechanical engineering, said airsoft is much more than people shooting at each other.

"You will discover real quick that there's more thinking than there is shooting," Ellison said.

Kansas Planned Parenthood clinic charged despite skeptical state officials

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - A Planned Parenthood clinic was charged Wednesday with providing unlawful abortions and other crimes by a county prosecutor who had engaged in a high-profile battle with the clinic when he was Kansas attorney general.

Johnson County District Attorney Phill Kline charged the Overland Park, Kan., clinic with 107 counts, 23 of them felonies. Besides 29 misdemeanor counts of providing unlawful late-term abortions, the clinic is charged with multiple counts of making a false writing, failure to maintain records and failure to determine viability.

Case documents have been sealed, according to a court order. The first hearing is set for Nov. 16.

Kline's office did not immediately comment on the charges.

Peter Brownlie, Planned Parenthood of Kansas and Mid-Missouri's president and chief executive officer, said Wednesday that the group hasn't had any contact with the district attorney's office but has heard rumors for months that Kline, an abortion opponent, was planning to file criminal charges.

"I've heard nothing at all about specific charges that have been filed," Brownlie said. "We always provide high-quality care in full accord with state and federal law."

As for allegations that Planned Parenthood performed illegal late-term abortions, Brownlie said its clinic doesn't perform any abortions past the 22nd week of pregnancy.

Attorney General Paul Morrison previously reviewed all of the allegations upon which Kline's criminal charges are based and found no wrongdoing, Morrison spokeswoman Ashley Anstaett said.

"We are skeptical that these charges have any merit, and we continue to wonder how much politics influenced Mr. Kline's decision to file these charges," Anstaett said. Planned Parenthood, Kline and Morrison are embroiled in another lawsuit pending before the Kansas Supreme Court. Planned Parenthood sued Kline, and Morrison later successfully intervened on the state's behalf.

Documents in that case remain sealed as well, and neither Kline nor Planned Parenthood have discussed it, but Morrison warned Planned Parenthood's attorneys in June that Kline appeared to still have access to copies of patient records he had obtained as attorney general. Morrison said those records were forwarded from the attorney general's office to the district attorney's office a few days before Kline left the attorney general's office.

As attorney general, Kline fought for two years to get abortion records from the Overland Park clinic and a Wichita clinic operated by Dr. George Tiller. He said he was investigating whether clinic doctors performed illegal abortions and failed to report suspected child abuse; the clinics alleged he was on a "fishing expedition."

Portions of the sealed documents were leaked to Fox News commentator Bill O'Reilly, who discussed them in a segment where he interviewed Kline days before Kline lost his re-election bid in November. Kline has denied being the source of the leak.

Kline filed charges against

Tiller in December, while he was still attorney general, but a judge threw out the case, saying Kline didn't have the jurisdiction to file it.

In June, Morrison filed charges against Tiller that Morrison described as technical violations. Morrison said he found no wrongdoing at the Planned Parenthood clinic.

Morrison, an abortion-rights supporter, was a Republican serving as Johnson County district attorney when he changed to a Democrat to challenge Kline, a Republican, for the attorney general job. After Morrison won, local GOP activists picked Kline to take Morrison's old job.

Art studios have charm, character but need renovation

By Ashley Frey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In an old building on the far side of campus, there is a series of art studios open all day. Students come at all hours of the day to put their creative minds to work, transforming their sculpture, ceramic and other ideas into a variety of art pieces.

The ceramic and sculpture studios – along with a painting studio – take up the entire corridor of the second floor and the majority of the first floor in West Stadium.

"It is big, but not that nice, here," said Ashley Small, graduate student in art. "The studios used to be old dorm rooms. It is really an interesting old building."

Small and the other graduate students mostly have the second floor to themselves while they work for their master's degree of fine arts. Meanwhile, the first floor is generally for the undergraduate art students.

With 40 students – five of those being graduate students – people are always entering and exiting the studios.

"At 8 p.m., there are already four people coming in," Small said. "It is not unusual to come in at night. People always come in late at night. I like it because we get to bounce around ideas off one another."

While undergraduate students mainly work for the ceramic classes, creating pots and other similar items, graduate students work on sculpture, and also ceramics.

"I use the wheel, making pottery on potter's wheels," said Bo Bedilion, graduate student in art. "I have made pots for the pottery sale to make money for the Potter's Guild, which helps to get money for the department."

Despite being an interesting building, the facilities are outdated. Most of the money raised from the pottery sale goes toward updating the space and purchasing more equipment.

"It has a lot of character and is very spacious," said Casey Westbrook, assistant professor in art. "However, it inhibits us. I have cancelled classes many times, because it is raining inside."

With the spacious rooms, students are able to do several different types of projects, Westbrook said. The students and faculty usually have enough space for what they want to do, she said.

"I have been here since I became a graduate student in 2004," Westbrook said. "It does have a lot of character. It creates a tight-knit community and really allows students to network."

Though the rooms are outdated, the students said they still enjoy the area.

"It's a great studio," Bedilion said. "It is my first semester here, and I feel right at home."

The studios have become a hideaway for the students, Small said.

"We get to do what we want here," Small said. "I enjoy being away from everything and having the freedom to do what I want."

ASK THE FIFTH YEAR

Sleep, television unnecessary for stressed college students

My life is a wreck. I'm really struggling with the balance of school, work and a social life. You gotta help me out.

You're asking the wrong guy. I know what you're thinking: "But Adam, you know everything." And while it might appear that way, in all honesty, I'm just a fool chasing a dream that doesn't exist.

I've never actually had a problem with time management. I've never cared to balance my time, and thus far, it's worked out wonderfully. I do what I have to when I have to and do what I want when I can. But if you're one of those people who have it engraved in your mind that life has to be hard, then maybe I can give you a little bit of advice.

ADAM

Stop sleeping – Why not? A beautiful lady once told me, "You'll have plenty of time to sleep when you're dead." While I'm not sure what that means, I'm choosing to not only agree with it, but also to wholeheartedly advocate it.

Don't get me wrong – I absolutely adore sleep – but I'm not the one who is struggling with life here, you are. Ironically, the first step to living a good life is accepting you have a bad one. But to each his own, I suppose. You have your stress, I have my easy life.

So, in your stressful, hard-working life, you should become a connoisseur of coffee. Drink it all, and be merry. Don't worry about kidney failure – you've got two of them. Plus, if you have any siblings, you've probably got a few more on reserve.

If you don't enjoy coffee, there are still mountains of energy drinks at your disposal. I remember when all we had was Red Bull. Kids these days have it so easy, with all their options. Though I guess we had our luxuries too, including American Gladiators, Thundercats, and Sheira.

Go ahead and try every drink on the market. When my friends and I drove down to Auburn, Ala., in September, I drove the entire time. 17 hours. Non-stop. I probably drank 15 or 17 of those energy drinks. I was wired – and greasy, real greasy. Speaking of Auburn, though, you all should make a trip down there. Nicest people ever. They'll bake you a cake and wash your underwear before you realize you're not wearing any.

Give yourself more time. Give up some of those material needs.

Getting rid of television was the best decision I've ever made. Though I do miss AMC's "Movies in the Afternoon," and the dots and lines thing from the ARTS channel, I have a lot more time to get things done and enjoy life. You just don't realize how much time you waste on things you don't need until they're gone.

If you want to go to school but can't afford it without working, and doing so is creating problems, then go ahead and take out a few more loans. Chances are, if you're here for the long haul, you'll have a well-paying job when you leave. So paying off those loans won't be a problem – unless you're a philosophy major. In that case, good luck.

Madonna signs with Live Nation

Madonna announced recently that she will leave her long-time record label Warner Brothers to work with the concert mammoth, Live Nation.

The exact terms of the deal are unclear at this time, but rumors speculate that the deal is worth more than $120 million dollars.

Madonna, who has been a popular music icon for the last 25 years, said the move will allow for more of a partnership, something she did not feel she was getting from her current label.

"Live Nation has offered me a true partnership, and after 25 years in the business, I feel that I deserve that," Madonna said.

The deal includes everything Madonna will produce as an artist for the next ten years. New studio releases, touring, merchandising and everything else that has Madonna's name on it are included in the monster contract. The Madonna fan club also will be included.

iPhone unexpectedly opens up to third party programs

In a stunning turn of events, Apple announced that the iPhone will allow third party software to be installed on the phone. When the phone first came out, Apple did not allow unofficial software on the phone.

Currently, programs can be found on the Internet to be installed on the phone – but at the user's risk. Damage or problems with the phone caused by the installation of the programs voids the warranty Apple includes with the phone.

It is unclear why Apple chose to open the phone, but the prospects of programs to be added are endless. The opening will not happen overnight. Steve Jobs, Apple CEO, said the process will take time, according to an article on CNN.com.

"I had a retail store downtown for 27 years, and we were doing quite well. It just wasn't creating the kind of environment I wanted anymore, so I closed the shop down so I could work on the large clocks more. I get to work on clocks all over the place, including Newton, N.J.; Vinton, Iowa; Chicago, Ill., and a lot of other places."

Even though he closed his retail store, Seay said he has maintained a small workshop behind his house so he can work on various parts and small clocks.

"At some point, I'll be too old to be climbing up towers, but I don't want to lose all those customers that I've appreciated over all these years, and that's why I'm keeping the small-clocks part of my business running."

When he first began traveling, Seay said he did not realize how important his family would be to his business — his wife Karen, especially. For the last 20 years, she has taken all the phone calls from potential clients and done all the paperwork.

"If I can get a client to talk with her, I'm 85 percent sure I'll get the client," Seay said. "One thing I didn't think of beforehand when I started on these projects—I didn't know how much I would miss her when I'm gone. So I often ask her to go with me."

Despite his many travels, he said most of the clock parts he uses are from Manhattan businesses.

"I keep the money local, so it stays within this community," Seay said. "I get my fasteners from Fastenal, the glass from ManCo Glass, Sherwin Williams, and the list just goes on."

Seay has been maintaining the Riley County Courthouse clock for nearly 30 years, according to a Manhattan Historical Society pamphlet. The clock broke in 1939, and a motor was installed to keep it operating. In 1979, Seay told county commissioners that with their and the community's help, he would restore the clock to its original working condition.

He got most of the money from donations and the rest from county commissioners. The restored clock worked properly on its original weight-powered system. It just had to be wound once a week, which Seay has done since then.

Seay is working on the clock again, because in 2003 he said he noticed some parts were wearing out.

The plexiglas clock faces installed in 1980 are being replaced with laminated glass, which Seay said, "looks more like the original faces, which were frosted glass."

Even though he has spent much of his time with clocks, Seay said he still loves them.

"I'm a very lucky person to have a profession that I still enjoy so much after 30 years, and I have no intentions of ever retiring," he said. "As long as I have all my faculties, I will always be working on timepieces of some the time. The clock has been a sentinel of history passing by, from the years of horse-drawn carriages with ladies dressed in long crinoline dresses and gentlemen in broadcloth suits with wide lapels and wearing derby hats, to the modern era where college kids race their sports cars late at night. It has seen the years of frowth and pestilence, as well as the opulent years of prosperity. It has looked down on parades, watching soldiers marching to the militant music of John Philip Sousa, some to die and never return. The clock has witnessed torrential rains and floods and college victory parades. It has seen the change of fashion, and during the years, it too became more modern — its works were modified to make it electrically driven.

David Seay wants to restore the clock back to its original condition. He is interested in time pieces of all kinds. He said he is a young man with dedication, extremely happy with his work. George Hampton, an older man, got David interested in repairing watches and clocks. He is happy with his work, never noticing the endless hours spent doing tedious work. The restoration of the Courthouse clock, as a non-profit venture, was Seay's idea. In the beginning, obtaining the clock was a difficult job that required a concerted effort by many people.

When the courthouse was built, quarried from native limestone, a committee was formed in 1906 to obtain a clock. The subscription form in a local newspaper had this advertisement:

"Courthouse Clock
If 1000 people will subscribe $1.00 each, a clock can be placed in the tower of the new Riley County Courthouse. It is believed that we have 1000 such people in the county. Are you one of them?"

"If you are, send your dollar to any financial institution in Riley County, where subscriptions will be received. Acknowledgement of all subscriptions will be made in the county papers."

By Order of the Committee

Their goal to raise $1,000 was not reached because "The Industrialist," Vol. 33, page 29 in 1906 had this news item:

"Manhattan will have a street carnival next week to raise funds for a new courthouse clock. Something over $600 were gathered for the timepiece by subscriptions among the businessmen, and it is expected that the several stand concessions will raise the amount to the required $1200."

"The Industrialist" in 1907 had this item:

"The courthouse clock is finally in place and doing satisfactory work. It will probably require some time to get it completely regulated. The dials are six and a half feet in diameter and the figures 14 inches in length. The pendulum, with a 75-pound ball, is nine feet in length, and makes a vibration in one and a half seconds. The hammer weighs 40 pounds and strikes the hour on a bell weighing 1200 pounds. The clock weighs 1500 pounds and the winding, once per week, will require about 20 minutes. Behind each dial, for night use, are six 4-candle power electric lights, regulated by an automatic switch."

Other articles indicate that the clock was manufactured by the E. Howard Clock Company of Boston, Massachusetts.

Seay said his project is massive. He'll try to obtain some of the parts if he can find other clocks of similar design, but he knows that many of them will have to be fabricated by hand. It is a labor of love for David, because after the clock is put together it will be his duty to wind the clock once a week. He appreciates all the help given to him by the Riley County Historical Society and the Older Manhattan Neighborhoods Association. A historical landmark will be restored for future generations to enjoy.

they plan on it, and it's the same as my sister," Jordy said. "They support us well, and I've enjoyed it."

Kelsey also said she enjoys the closeness to home.

"It's nice to be able to have from my parents to my grandparents to everyone in this area come to my games," she said. "The community is such a support. They were there for Jordy, and I can already tell they're going to be there for me."

Jordy already has made his mark on K-State. Now Kelsey is hoping it's her turn to carry on the Nelson name.

"I couldn't pass up this opportunity," she said. "It is a dream come true. It's very exciting. Growing up and watching all the games here and getting the opportunity to step foot out on that court is amazing."

give back to that experience."

Students seeing the Changing Lives Campaign at work decided to create their own branch to aid the campaign. K-State PROUD is a student-run philanthropy effort to aid Changing Lives.

Emily Besler, K-State PROUD internal coordinator for 2006, said K-State PROUD has won the national award for most outstanding external program and encourages students to get involved in the campaign as it returns next spring during basketball season. Students will have the opportunity to donate $10 and receive a K-State PROUD T-shirt.

"I've just been amazed by the willingness of students to give back and the understanding that helping students today starts a cycle of giving back," Besler, senior in political science, said. "It's not only changing things here at K-State, but it's also setting an example for the entire nation."

The money that has been raised has already been used on the K-State campus for several years. Since the campaign's inception, 13 buildings have been built using the campaign funds, and Weaver said the money also has been used to establish 882 scholarships.

"Both personally for me as well as from my university experience, people's generosity and their ability to make the contributions is just amazing, and we have seen the level of gift go up increasingly from what I've expected," Weaver said. "We've had 70

$1 million or more donations and 35,000 new first-time donors during this campaign," Weaver said.

The Changing Lives Campaign will run until June 30, 2008, and will continue to raise money for university efforts.

"If we don't raise private funds, we're going to be handcuffed in what we can do here," Mortenson said. "The foundation represents the future of K-State, and if we don't give as faculty and staff, then why should people outside the university participate?"

Wamego man arrested for assault

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Wamego man was charged with kidnapping, aggravated intimidation of a witness, aggravated assault and criminal threat, according to the Pottawatomie County attorney.

Brian J. Bachman, 24, was charged Oct. 10 at a Blue Rapids, Kan., construction site by the Kansas Bureau of Investigation for alleged attempted first-degree murder, aggravated robbery, kidnapping, aggravated assault and criminal threat against a 46-year-old Manhattan man, said Pottawatomie County Sheriff Greg Riat.

Sherry Schuck, Pottawatomie County attorney, said the official charges did not include attempted first-degree murder or aggravated robbery.

According to a release from the Pottawatomie County Sheriff's Office, Bachman allegedly lured the man on Oct. 9 to a rural area southeast of Blaine, Kan., on the pretense of bidding on a job.

Bachman allowed the Manhattan man to leave after a period of time, according to the release.

Schuck said the incident occurred on a rural county road. She said the two men were business acquaintances, and the victim was not injured.

Schuck was not able to release any further details on the case.

Riat said Bachman originally was held at the Pottawatomie County Jail, but he was released on bond.

Senator Brownback withdraws candidacy

By Amanda Keim
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., will leave the 2008 presidential race today because of reportedly low funds. According to the Boston Herald Online, Brownback was seventh in fundraising from July through September with a mere $94,000 on hand. This amount is reportedly far less than his potential rivals' on the election trail.

BROWNBACK

The Herald also reported that Brownback's politics played a large role in his decision to drop from the race. Brownback's support of citizenship for illegal immigrants hampered his conservative voting pool while his anti-abortion policies deterred liberal voters.

Eric Ramsey, junior in engineering and member of Kansans for Brownback, has worked with Brownback's campaign, and though he supported Brownback's presidency, he does not view his decision as a loss to the United States.

"Even if he did pull out and even if he didn't end up winning the election, I think it did get his name out," Ramsey said. "I don't think that it has any devastating effects for

Students help family farms during favorable markets

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Heat blazes and unpredictable weather reigns while families battle Mother Nature to defend their hard work. Oil prices soar and governmental policies flux and leave them scrambling for or basking in the turn of a profit.

Every day, Kansas farmers and ranchers wake up unaware but prepared for the next wild card to be thrown by the weather or by the markets. But this past year has been smooth sailing for most local farmers and their families, said Kraig Roozeboom, assistant professor of agronomy.

"Right now a bunch of the farming community is in a pretty good mood because of the high grain prices," he said.

Roozeboom said though weather has been favorable and markets have been high, it is hard to tell if they will stay that way. It was not long ago when grain prices were low, he said. But for now, local family farmers and the K-State students who work on them are reveling in the soaring prices and hoping for the best for the future.

Matt McCune, senior in animal science, grew up on his family's farm in Plainville, Kan., and said he returns to help out whenever K-State does not have a home football game.

"We're in one of the few areas in the state where we caught the rains when needed and averaged 50 bushels to the acre," he said. "Our crops are really exceptional this year, and we've been doing pretty dang good."

McCune said his family sold their wheat for more than $7 a bushel compared to the $2-$3 it sold for when he was growing up.

But planting is not the only form of profit his family relies on. McCune said no matter how well their crops are doing — wheat, milo and corn — his family's biggest "cash crop" stems from raising and selling cattle.

"We basically farm to support our cattle," he said. "In our situation, we have to keep growing to stay ahead of debt and future problems. Every year we pick up more ground and get bigger with the cattle herd to try and increase our assets."

Tiffany Ebert, sophomore in animal science and pre-veterinary option, said the members of her family use most of the corn, soybeans, wheat and hay they grow on their farm to feed their livestock because meat is a much more predictable market.

Ebert said her mother runs a nursery for their pigs and cattle where they raise the animals completely before selling them to a meat packer.

"As long as I can remember, I've always helped out doing something on the farm," she said. "My mom and dad work on the farm pretty much every day, and in the summer, it's pretty much my job, too. I guess I don't know any different, but it's fun to be able to help out my family."

Chantry Sorell, senior in operational management, said he travels to his family's ranch in Flush, Kan., four to five times a week to help

Art museum to feature all-day events at reopening

A copper truck sculpture is on display through Aug. 21, 2008, at the new outdoor sculpture garden at The Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art. Elliot Pujol, professor of art, took more than 30 years to cover the truck with copper. The museum's grand reopening will take place from 11 a.m. to 7 p.m. Sunday.

The Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art will feature a day of activities and events in celebration of its expansion and grand reopening Sunday.

The day's activities will take place from 11 a.m. to 7 p.m. with the theme "Art's Up!"

"The theme was chosen because we are able to put the art back up on the walls," said Martha Scott, the museum's marketing and business manager.

One of the day's events includes the Manhattan High School Thespians "bringing art to life," Scott said.

"They'll either be interpreting a piece of art or acting as the artist who created the art they are near," she said. "We thought that would be a wonderful way to get high-school students engaged with the art that's on display and highlight the abilities that they are able to do."

The 17,000 square-foot addition features an outdoor sculpture garden and two new gallery rooms. The museum's $7 million expansion — all raised through donations — includes the expansion, renovations to the original museum and fixtures like special units for storing artwork.

The larger gallery is a wide-open space with several options for exhibiting art, Scott said. The museum's addition also features a smaller gallery with temporary walls that can be added if needed, she said.

The museum has been closed to the public since late August because of preparation for new exhibits. Construction on the museum's expansion started in Oct. 2005, and Wichita-based Coonrod and Associates Construction Company Inc., served as the general contractor for the project.

Discussion of the museum's expansion started at the fifth-anniversary celebration in 2001. Scott said the museum contained about 1,500 pieces of artwork when it opened in 1996. It now has more than 6,000 pieces, she said.

The 24,000 square-foot museum opened Oct. 13, 1996. Ross Beach named Professor calls for citizens to rediscover civic discourse

By Scott Girard

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Communities and universities need to return to the forum-based method of discussing pertinent issues, said a University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee communication professor and author Thursday in Hale Library.

William Keith said people today do not discuss issues civilly; they instead try to debate and win arguments without regard for the actual issues.

"Where's the civility?" Keith said in front of the full audience in the Hale Library Hemisphere Room. "You see a lot of people who want to win (arguments) at all costs. Where's the civic discourse?"

Keith said people, especially TV pundits, debate issues instead of civilly discussing and learning about them. He showed a clip of "Daily Show" host Jon Stewart's appearance on "Crossfire," a former CNN political debate program, a few weeks before the 2004 elections.

Stewart urges the hosts of "Crossfire" to have political discussions instead of debates that he described as partisan hackery.

Keith said communities across the United States used to gather at forums to discuss issues during the 1930s, but lost interest in them because of wars and the emergence of other entertainment outlets.

"The public forum was a place for people to get together and discuss their problems," Keith said.

Keith also said communities and universities in the '30s and '40s made an effort to teach students and adults discussion skills. He said every college made some type of basic discussion class, which have been virtually removed from university curriculums.

In the middle of the century, Keith said, interest groups replaced much of the forum-type discussion.

"The point of interest-group politics is not that everyone participates, but that somebody that has your interests in mind does participate," Keith said.

He said the number of interest groups also have decreased, leaving most people without a voice in the democratic process and little knowledge about the issues. Keith explained the issue by using an analogy from the 2000 book

"Bowling Alone" by Harvard professor Robert Putnam, that compares bowling alone to the decline of citizen involvement.

"It is not that people won't bowl," Keith said. "It's that people won't join bowling leagues."

Keith finished the lecture with a 1950s promotional film about gathering information and understanding important local issues.

Though the film had poor acting and filmography, Keith said it had several important lessons. He said citizens need to learn the issue by asking what other citizens want and are worried about, along with asking local and national experts.

The lecture was part of K-State's Institute for Civic Discourse and Democracy lecture series. ICDD Director David Proctor said Keith was the first professor in the series. He said other speakers were politicians or lawyers and did not relate to the student crowd nearly as well as Keith.

Lynn Lindquist, senior in theater, said she thought the lecture was valuable, especially for college students.

University Honors Program features smaller, more advanced courses

By Adrienne DeWeese

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An all-university program that offers students the opportunity to enhance their college career with honors courses had its open house Thursday afternoon in Leisure Hall.

In its second year at K-State, the University Honors Program includes more than 400 K-State freshmen and sophomores. While college-level honors courses have existed at K-State for many years, last year was the first for a university-wide program, said Stephen Kiefer, University Honors Program director and professor of psychology.

"It allows us to get the different colleges together," Kiefer said. "It allows us to get students from the College of Human Ecology with students from the College of Engineering because that wasn't happening too much before."

Once admitted to the University Honors Program, students must take at least seven credit hours of university-level honors courses. They also must take at least eight credit hours at the individual college honors level.

As a junior or senior, honors students must submit a project they choose for the program. The projects are similar to a thesis project, Kiefer said.

Kiefer said honors courses have about 20 students in each class.

"One of the advantages of an honors class is that it's going to be small," he said.

In spring 2004, Provost Duane Nellis said he was a candidate for K-State's provost position. At Nellis' first interview, then-Student Body President John O'Hara made it evident to Nellis that his goal was to create a university-wide honors program.

After coming to K-State, Nellis said he put together a task force to create the program, and it was initiated in January 2006.

"I was very committed to trying to make that happen here at Kansas State — not in any way to compromise the strengths of our college-based programs — but to integrate those college-based programs into a broader university-level activity," Nellis said.

Students must have a high-school weighted or unweighted 3.75 GPA and an ACT score of 28 or higher to qualify for admission to the University Honors Program. Students with extracurricular and leadership activities who do not meet the GPA and ACT qualifications still are encouraged to apply.

Because of the number of applicants, meeting criteria does not guarantee admission, according to the program's informational pamphlet. Students are required to submit an application packet for admittance.

Vernica Baus, sophomore in marketing, said she received acceptance to the University Honors Program in fall 2006. Baus also said she was excited to have another opportunity for involvement with the program.

"Through taking honor classes, you really get more out of the classes," she said. "It's a great way for students to go above and beyond and achieve. It's important to tell employers that you've had the courses and that you utilized them."

While she studies abroad in Seville, Spain, in spring 2008,

Baus said she plans to take several honors business classes. Baus said she encourages students to apply for the University Honors Program so they can have more involvement in their courses.

"It's a great way to utilize and really put an emphasis on your college career," she said.

My jeans are starched and my whiskey's in stock,
Tomorrow it's Rouletter, and the ladies will flock.
So grow out your beards and throw on your pearl snaps,
Bust out those spurs and put on your best chaps.

And dance in the barn under the light of the moon.

It's the Greek community's longest running tradition.

So prepare to get rowdy under the stars,
You haven't partied cowboy until it's with AGR's.

TO THE POINT

Museum efforts noteworthy

After six years of construction obstacles near the southeast corner of campus, the Mariana Kistler Beach Museum of Art will have its grand reopening Sunday.

The day will feature eight hours of activities, giveaways and presentations that students and area community members can take advantage of at no cost.

The museum took more than five years of hard work and fundraising to establish its presence at K-State. More than 20 years ago, Ruth Ann Wefald started a steering committee to establish an art museum at K-State. At the time, K-State was the only large university in Kansas without an art museum.

Its popularity grew quickly once established in 1996. At the museum's fifth anniversary celebration, it was decided to expand the museum because not enough room existed for its artwork.

The art museum also features an architectural structure unlike any other building on campus. With its square footage nearly doubled, students can take pride in a building that holds more than 6,000 pieces of artwork.

Art is a fascinating beauty in life, and it often challenges observers to look at their own lives in different ways. The museum is more than just another building on campus — it is a structure that contains one opportunity after another for students to examine their lives and personal circumstances through a different angle.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Children hear and watch the Disney interpretation of fairy tales, making them hope and wish for a make-believe situation of their own. While some of us grew up and realized these were only stories, many liberal democrats still live in this fantasy world.

BRETT KING

Their dream of having the first black or woman presidential candidate, nominated by a major party, is falling like Humpty Dumpty in the 2008 election all the king's men won't be able to put their dreams back together.

These liberals have spewed their stories of a fool's paradise in which health coverage is given for free and every child receives $5,000, once either Hillary Clinton or Barack Obama is elected president.

The "Chicken Little" republicans are screaming that these two candidates will destroy our country, but they are wasting valuable time, effort and resources by failing to concentrate on the only democratic candidate with a shot — John Edwards.

Candidates running for president for the Democratic Party side do not have many ideas to differentiate themselves.

They all support the same issues, but their plans seem to look more like an auction of how much tax-payer money they can spend and how high their taxes will be.

Obama laid his $65 billion health-care plan out that would create a National Health Insurance Exchange. According to Obama's Web site, "The exchange will require that all the plans offered are at least as generous as the new public plan and meet the same standards for quality and efficiency."

Not to be outdone, Clinton announced her $110 billion universal health-care coverage plan. According to Fox News on Sept. 17, "People who receive insurance through the workplace could continue to do so; businesses, in turn, would be required to offer insurance to employees, or contribute to a government-run pool that would help pay for those not covered."

On how to pay for these programs, Clinton promises on her Web site to "balance the federal budget so we don't pass today's massive debts to the next generation."

That is interesting because the only way to pay for a $110 billion health-care plan — which, according to The Washington Post, is $20 billion program to give the average 4 million children $5,000 each year — will be nearly impossible with a balanced budget proposal. The only solution is a massive tax increase.

Obama's tax plan has been described by CNN as a "Robin Hood approach" to taxes. He is offering an $80 billion tax cut for middle and lower class, while increasing taxes for the rich.

To stop these one-ups, democrats have dreamt about a ticket with both Clinton and Obama, but there is an extremely slim chance of this occurring.

Both Clinton and Obama's egos are too big to play second fiddle to the other, and they will end up ripping each other apart in the nomination process.

On the slim chance of the two coming together and winning, U.S. citizens would have the pleasure of having either a Bush or a Clinton as the top Executive Branch positions for 34 years.

A battle between the two frontrunners could fracture the party. Waiting in the wings is John Edwards.

He will be the dark-horse candidate, riding in to carry the democrat banner in the 2008

John Edwards' campaign strategy has looked similar to Bill Clinton's, causing people to believe he doesn't have a chance and continuing to appear on town hall forums — like the MTV/MySpace forum on Sept. 27 — to spread his message.

Republicans need to stop panicking and yelling, "The sky is falling." Take a few deep breaths, relax and recognize the turmoil inside the Democratic Party could be a great advantage in 2008.

Former athlete should be respected for kindness and ability

He went toe-to-toe with Muhammad Ali three times — winning once and losing twice — with Ali calling the third fight, "the closest thing to death" he had ever experienced. He won 73 percent of his fights by knock out, with only four losses.

TYLER SMITH

Joe Frazier is one of the best fighters who ever stepped into the ring, and he deserves more credit than he has been given.

These days, athletics have become a theatrical show that excludes the accomplishments of humble athletes. These humble athletes are true role models who can offer insight into becoming better individuals and should not be overlooked.

For Frazier, one failed attempt at a comeback sealed the end of his career. Now, he trains local fighters in Philadelphia. Among them, is his own daughter, Jackie Frazier-Lyde.

His record is immaculate, his style was like a tank and though he was well-known, his quiet demeanor kept him from developing an international legend like Ali.

He always was happy — happy as a child, happy as a fighter, and now happy as a father and coach. Joe Frazier always was smiling — not the mocking showboat smile of Muhammad Ali or the fierce expression of George Foreman — but the simple smile of a man who is glad he was born.

He was always big — bigger than the other kids, who he often protected from bullies. Since he was bigger, he could fight.

It was something he said that came from inside — no dodging, no dancing around the ring. His style was simple and efficient: keep moving forward and keep swinging. Many were faster — a handful were stronger — but no one was tougher.

He took the gold in the 1964 Olympics in Tokyo when he was 20 years old and turned pro soon after, winning every fight his first year by knockout without three rounds.

When Ali was stripped of his titles, Frazier knocked out Buster Mathis to become the most-disputed undisputed heavyweight champion in history.

With Ali gone from the game, and with limited income, Frazier helped support the former champ financially and spoke up for him in press conferences and to the media.

When Ali came back, Ali repaid Frazier by verbally humiliating him and calling him an "Uncle Tom." Frazier sat listening at weigh-ins and pre-bout interviews, jaw tight, intent to let his fists do the talking. In the 15th round he knocked Ali down and won with a unanimous decision.

He fought other fights and lost to Ali twice. He lost to Foreman also, but he never gave up. He didn't showboat or brag. He was the kind of fighter we don't see anymore, with the type of demeanor lost on the competitors of the day.

He really did punch frozen meat in a packing plant, and he ran up those famous steps long before Rocky did. In a world short of real sportsmen, Joe Frazier should be remembered as a true athlete who fought because he loved to fight.

Christina Forsberg | COLLEGIAN

Today the sport, has become a show, — of boxing one of the most glamorized and ostentatious displays of Hollywood's theft of real competition. The men who now compete are as much actors as athletes.

Every once in a while, new talent makes its way out of Wales or the deepest parts of Russia and wins a few smaller, solid fights before they are swept up in the hype, but it is rare to see one so unaffected by it as Frazier. As a fighter, he deserves the utmost respect, but being the humble athlete that he is, he probably won't ask for it.

All Faiths Chapel home to weddings

Danforth Chapel, constructed in 1949, was host to several interdenominational meetings and services as well as weddings and performances.

UNIVERSITY ARCHIVES

Questions concerning historical information, news that was not covered or anything you want to know are welcomed. Please e-mail questions to collegian@ksu.edu.

The All-Faiths Chapel, north of McCain Auditorium, was not always used just for music recitals. For decades, K-State students and Manhattan residents tied the knot in the adjoined Danforth Chapel on the west side of the building.

The Danforth Chapel was constructed in 1949 as a memorial to the more than 5,000 K-State students who served in World War II, 200 of which died. A few years later, the rest of the All Faiths Chapel was constructed.

The following is an excerpt from the program for the Oct. 9, 1949, memorial ceremony: "But as we dedicate this building we do more than honor the memory of individual men and women.

More importantly, we dedicate ourselves to an Idea for which they fought, an Idea central to democracy. The person, by and of himself, has a unique value that derives from his relationship to a higher power."

Two years earlier, Gen. and later U.S. president Dwight D. Eisenhower was the guest speaker at the chapel's groundbreaking ceremony. Eisenhower's brother Milton was president of the university at the time.

Throughout the years, the chapel has been host to several weddings, special student communion services, interdenominational meetings and a variety of area and university recitals and concerts.

The chapel also has been host to controversy in the past. According to a 1996 Collegian article, a little more than a decade ago, the chapel was host to several same-sex marriages, even though the state frowned upon the act.

Students, faculty to vote whether or not to add gym, workout room, parking lot at Rec

Jelani Yancey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students will be able to vote on whether the Chester E. Peters Recreational Center should be expanded and renovated. The bill authorizing the vote passed unanimously at the Student Senate meeting Thursday night.

"It's been years since anybody did anything — as far as major renovations — to the rec," senate treasurer Bryan Cox said. "The current recreational center was not designed for the level of use that it's at."

The bill to bring the vote before students was introduced to the Senate Oct. 11 by Student Body President Matt Wagner.

The vote will take place electronically Nov. 13. Students can access the vote through www.ksu.edu/elections from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m.

If students vote to pass the bill, the rec will be expanded by 88,000 square feet, Cox said. Gym equipment, like cardiovascular and weight-lifting machines, will be added along with an aerobics room — larger than the current one. A hard-floor court also would be added, and the indoor track would be expanded, Cox said.

If the bill is passed there also will be a new parking lot and entrance added on the south side of facility, he said.

Currently, $36.14 of the privilege fees each student pays per semester go toward the rec. The bill would increase that figure to $56.14 per student per semester until 2011. After that, the fee will become $53.64, where it will remain until 2039, barring any changes.

Upgrading the center was a major issue during last year's student government elections, he said.

The current rec complex was built in 1986, when K-State's enrollment was about 10,000. It was expanded in 1993 and is now 160,000 square feet of space, said Clint Blaes, privilege fee committee chair.

Though K-State's enrollment has risen to 23,000 since then, the rec has not expanded to keep up with the school's growth, Blaes said.

"This has been talked about a lot by students for several years," Blaes said. "People get frustrated because the machines are full and the basketball courts are taken."

SGA and K-State's administration paid $37,500 last April for the Ebert Mayo Design Group, a local architectural firm, to produce a report with visual renderings, a virtual tour, blue prints and a cost analysis for the proposed additions to the rec.

An expanded rec center would be good for recruitment because prospective students get an idea of K-State student life by surveying the rec when they visit, said Tim Weninger, faculty senate representative.

Student Senate also voted to fund travel and activities for the following campus groups: the Society for Appreciation of Bharatiya Heritage and Art, Council for Exceptional Children, the Students for Environmental Action, and Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators.

BSU to have panel, demonstration about hate crimes, discrimination

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A panel discussion and demonstration about hate crimes and their media coverage will take place today.

"X'ed Out of Society," which includes a silent demonstration, rally and eight-member panel discussion, is an opportunity for students to learn more about recent U.S. hate crimes, said Bryon Williams, Black Student Union president and senior in economics.

Black Student Union is sponsoring "X'ed Out."

From 8-11 a.m. at the K-State Student Union Food Court, BSU members will distribute tape for students to place an "x" on their T-shirts.

Aside from the rally and panel discussion, a silent demonstration will take place until 5 p.m. today, Bryon Williams said.

"This is the way we feel — if we say something, it's not going to be heard anyway," he said about the "x" on T-shirts.

A rally will take place from 11 a.m. to noon at Bosco Student Plaza. Students will read about different hate-crime cases and distribute informational pamphlets.

A panel discussion featuring faculty members and students will take place from noon to 1 p.m. in the Union Courtyard.

Recent cases like Megan Williams, a 20-year-old black woman who was kidnapped, raped and tortured by six white residents from Logan County, W.Va., and the Jena Six will be addressed during the panel discussion, Williams said.

"Of all the things that's happened over the last couple of months, it's gotten a small amount of news coverage," Bryon Williams said. "It's downplayed when it is reported, and it seems like it's one local news story, and that's it. It feels like we've been X'ed out by society by our own news societies and even America."

Faculty panel members include Kimetris Baltrip, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications; Juanita McGowan, American Ethnic Studies Program director; John Exdell, associate professor of philosophy; and Donald Saucier, assistant professor of psychology.

Bryon Williams said faculty panelists were chosen because of their diverse backgrounds on topics like the media, philosophy, racial relations and psychological perspectives.

Student panel members include Joshua Criswell, junior in social science; Letitia Tajuba, senior in political science; Kristen Wilkes, junior in sociology; and Nick Piper, senior in finance.

X'ed Out of Society is an opportunity for students to demonstrate their frustrations and suppressions, said Deborah Muhwezi, BSU vice president and junior in broadcast journalism.

"It's an opportunity to create an open dialogue and get students aware of issues," she said. "I would encourage people to come so they can become more educated and aware of what happens around them. How can you educate others about issues when you don't know about them yourself?"

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — For nine years, Frank Martin coached junior-varsity basketball in Miami.

He coached the kids who were a step too slow and an inch too short to make the varsity team. He coached, for the most part, in front of empty bleachers.

The experience taught him a lot about being a coach — how to run a practice, how to make a game plan, how to motivate the kids. But most of all, it taught him to work hard, even if no one was watching.

"No one came to see the junior varsity play," Martin said at Wednesday's Big 12 media day. "Everyone came to see the varsity play. That didn't make me work any harder or any less."

Now, everyone is watching. Martin has the nation's top recruiting class, an ultra-talented but enigmatic star in Michael Beasley, and some seriously big shoes to fill.

But Martin doesn't shrink from the lofty expectations. In fact, he embraces them.

"If we don't win, I want our fans to be (ticked) off," Martin said. "They have that right, because I want them to take pride in the product we put on the floor."

Martin wasn't handed the keys to the Wildcat basketball program — he was shoved behind the wheel at 60 mph. At the time he was hired, critics claimed the only reason he got the job was to keep the Wildcats' top-ranked recruiting class intact.

Today, Martin chuckles at the notion.

"The reality is, would you want to hire someone at K-State who has no chance of recruiting Mike Beasley or Bill Walker?" he said. "I got a kick out of it when people said that's the reason I was retained."

"It better be a reason I was retained, because if I couldn't recruit players like that, then I'd have no chance of ever being a BCS head coach."

For Walker, there was no doubt Martin was the right man to replace the departed Bob Huggins.

"Huggins groomed him to be a head coach," Walker said. "I think that's the best thing he could have done. He allowed Frank to have an opportunity to succeed, and I think that's going to happen."

Even so, Martin knows he'll likely spent most of his first season fielding questions about whether he's ready for this responsibility.

He also knows winning is the best — and perhaps only — answer.

"Would you be a fan of mine if I didn't compete for a championship?" Martin said. "That's what I'm about. I'm not into coaching so we can have a good season. I'm into coaching to win."

Kelsey Chipman and the Wildcats face Oklahoma tonight.

Volleyball team uses narrow, early-season loss as motivation

By Jonathan Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Outside hitter Kelsey Chipman remembers how close the K-State volleyball team was to knocking off Oklahoma when the two teams met Sept. 19.

"We beat ourselves big time," Chipman said of the 3-2 defeat. "We need to make sure we are doing things right on our side of the net."

Since that loss, the No. 14 Wildcats have won five of their last seven matches, with the only losses coming from top-ranked Nebraska (17-0, 10-0) and No. 6 Texas (13-5, 9-1).

When the Wildcats face the Sooners at 6 tonight in Norman, Okla., coach Suzie Fritz said she thinks her team will show significant improvement.

"We have been spending a good majority of time offensively, so I've seen a lot of growth in that area," Fritz said. "I've also felt like our defensive spontaneity has improved. Those two particular areas I think will help us stay in it better with them this time."

Normally, two or three days separate matches, but K-State will have just one day off from conference play after facing Texas Tech on Wednesday.

Fritz said she sees the bright side of the scheduling, though, and looks at the quick turnaround as a possible benefit.

"We got some rest last weekend with the bye," Fritz said. "I wouldn't want to turn it around every week, but I feel like we can do it. The advantage is that if we go down (to Oklahoma) and we play hard, hopefully we'll play well and then have the weekend off again."

The Wildcats' bye week came after they faced Texas on Oct. 6.

After a full week off, K-State returned to sweep Iowa State and Texas Tech.

Fritz said Oklahoma's offensive attack will be the Wildcats' main concern. Outside hitter Mariana Blum leads the Sooners, averaging 3.45 kills per game.

"They have two good middles, and they get to their outside hitters very, very fast, to the point where it's hard to catch up with it," Fritz said. "That's the biggest one, is in-system speed."

Oklahoma lost 3-0 to Texas on Wednesday and 3-0 to Nebraska on Saturday.

K-State will be the third-straight ranked opponent for OU.

Let ADs, coaches do their jobs

By Wendy Haun

More than once, I've heard rumors that a coach's contract will be terminated.

It could be because of allegations of wrong doings in the program. It could be because the team has a losing record. Or it could be because the school's alumni are having a fit about what is going on in their precious program. However, these alumni and fans should use discretion and let the coaches do their jobs.

Former Nebraska coach Frank Solich is a fine example.

Solich had a record of 58-19 during his six years in Lincoln. He is a Nebraska graduate, elected to the Nebraska Hall of Fame in 1992. He took the Cornhuskers to a bowl game all six years and was elected Big 12 Conference Coach of the Year twice. He was hand-picked by Nebraska legend Tom Osborne.

Most athletic directors would be perfectly happy to retain a coach with that kind of record. In his last season with the Huskers, Solich had a 9-3 regular season record in 2003 but was fired before his team's 17-3 win over Michigan State in the Alamo Bowl.

He finished with a winning record in every season but one (Nebraska went 7-7 in 2002), but he still was fired. Nebraska athletic director Steve Pederson justified this by saying Solich was leading the program into mediocrity.

Just because Nebraska didn't contend for the national championship every year does not mean they were mediocre. It's hard to live up to Osborne, who led the Huskers to three national championships in four years.

I firmly believe one season at .500 would not send any Wildcat coach packing, mostly because K-State alumni are satisfied with good competition and seeing the program headed in the right direction.

Fans might not have been happy with the results, but the K-State administration is rational enough not to fire a coach on a whim.

Texas A&M coach Dennis Franchione is under fire for a newsletter containing inside information sent to alumni with deep pockets. Coach Fran already was on the hot seat for not taking the Aggies in the right direction, before this little secret popped out.

If A&M is looking for a new coach at the end of the year, it probably won't be because of this newsletter, though the AD might pin it on that. It probably will be because the alumni are unsatisfied with a mediocre performance. At K-State, fans don't expect perfection, as long as teams are making progress. The rest of the nation's collegiate die-hard alumni should take notes.

The athletic director was hired for a reason. Let him do his job and stop putting pressure on him to reach perfection every time out because most likely, it will just lead to more disappointment.

Baseball team releases 2008 schedule

Ten teams that qualified for the 2007 NCAA tournament, including two that advanced to the College World Series, highlight the K-State baseball team's 2008 schedule, released Thursday by coach Brad Hill.

Of the 56 games on the schedule, 29 will be played at home, including 20 games against opponents that advanced to regional play in 2007.

Three of those games will be against College World Series participants UC-Irvine and Arizona State.

"This is one of the toughest schedules we've put together since I've been here," said Hill, who is entering his fifth year at the helm.

"We wanted to challenge our kids more and prepare ourselves for postseason play, and this schedule should give us a good indication of where this program is at."

New construction site to offer more services in Aggieville

Construction on Moro Street in Aggieville might soon be home to as many as four new businesses. Construction of the building could be finished close to the end of the year.

Where once lay an empty lot created by an eruption of flames, there soon will be a building for lease. Soon, 1120 Moro St. in Aggieville will be the home to as many as four new businesses as McCullough Development Inc. finishes construction on the new development.

Tim Trubey, manager of commercial properties for McCullough Development Inc., said construction has been in the process for approximately one year, but planning for the project was in the works long before that.

"That is a long and complicated process to figure out how to best use the lot and what type of building to construct," Trubey said. "There are a lot of factors that go into planning and development in a project of that magnitude."

Several years ago, a fire devastated two businesses that once occupied the lot. After the rubble was removed from the location, the lot switched ownership several times but now remains in the ownership of Manhattan residents, Trubey said.

Despite the immense planning that has gone into the new facility, little is known about its usage.

"All we know is that it's going to be retail space," said Jaina Lambert, manager of On the Wild Side. "We haven't been able to get anyone to tell us anymore than that. We don't know if it's going to be rented or if there's a business waiting to get in."

Despite the unknown use of the building, retailers in the area think any addition would be an improvement to the area.

"I think anything that they put in should be a benefit to Aggieville," said Steve Levin, manager of the K-State Student Union Bookstore. "Rather than having a vacant lot, having more services will give more options to the students."

Pete Anderson, owner of Rusty's Last Stand, said he is pleased with the idea of welcoming new businesses to the Aggieville area as long as they do not present competition.

"With any business in there's a greater chance that people might come in and buy a hamburger," Anderson said. "Being in the bar business, I would hope for retail stores."

Trubey said the whole building will span approximately 10,000 square feet and will be available to lease for any reasonable commercial use.

He also reiterated that the project was not designed with a specific purpose in use.

"It's something that's been in the planning stages for a while, and it's going to be a nice, new addition to Aggieville," Trubey said. Cullough estimates the building to be finished near the beginning of 2008.

Local artist Phyllis Pease has artwork in various places in Manhattan. Her pieces adorn the walls of Radina's Coffee Shop, So Long Saloon and Texas Star Cafe in Aggieville.

K-State alumna uses scrap metal to create works of art

By Whitney Hodgins
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fifteen years ago, K-State alumna Phyllis Pease was a successful art director for a Willoughby Design, a graphic design firm in the Westport area of Kansas City, Mo.

Now, she scours the alleys of Manhattan for scrap metal and old street signs.

Using a borrowed welder, she attaches the scraps together with broken mirror pieces, then she leaves her creations hanging on the walls of area coffee shops and galleries.

Pease, who graduated in 1987 with a bachelor's degree in graphic design, said she learned something important during the four years she spent in Kansas City obsessing over corporate logos and menu layouts.

"I think I'm going to live longer now," she said. "I don't think I was as good of an art director as I am an artist."

Radina's Coffee Shop in Aggieville is filled with Pease's artwork, which truly is trash reincarnate. Where some see flowers, there really are car hoods and scrap pieces of mirror. Where So Long Saloon customers see cacti and a country scene, there really are coils of rusted barbed wire and shards of metal.

It takes artistic vision to see beauty in garbage, but it takes inspiration to bring that vision out of the artist, she said. Manhattan is her inspiration.

"You don't have to be anywhere big to be successful," Pease said. "People don't care where you are. If they see good art, you can get it to them."

Pease said working as an art director was rewarding, but very stressful because of the competitive environment.

"It's a really competitive game because you're vying for that job," she said. "You keep pumping stuff out, but you're never going to win."

Her paintings, sculptures and designs add color and artistic variety to Manhattan, where demand for the artwork is higher than Pease said she expected it would be.

While she said the town lacks public artwork, one of the reasons she likes college towns is because of the bi-annual migration of students.

"I search the alleys and stuff, which is great because people move twice a year, so you can find some really good pieces," Pease said.

Most of what Pease does is self-taught, but she said she is not above getting help.

"It's fun to mix mediums," she said. "When I have an idea, I'll consider the best materials and figure out how to use them. I'll figure out anything, or find an artisan to teach me."

Pease said she hopes to inspire other acts of artwork for the sake of Manhattan's aesthetics, and she said much potential lies in K-State's wide range of talents.

"There's not enough public art," she said. "There are sculptures on campus, but there's so much room for more. We have great architects and engineers, so why don't we reflect that? Put some sculptures in the quad."

Her enthusiasm did not lack realism as she described the theory behind her vision for Manhattan.

"How you want your city to be portrayed and what you want people to see depends heavily on public art," she said. "Use the resources you have here, and be innovative."

She said appearances are important, but sometimes people put time and money above aesthetics.

"Sometimes the aesthetics are pushed down the scale because people assume they're not worth it," Pease said. "It's all about people willing to invest the money and time, but they're not always easy to find, especially with all of the building going on."

A background in design taught her the versatility and discipline she said is necessary to accurately express her ideas.

The oversized mural hanging inside Texas Star, for example, is Hispanic in tone with brightly painted chilis and a yellow sky.

The focus of the piece is Pease's Mexican mother, grinning at everyone with a red hibiscus behind her ear.

"I don't know where that idea came from," she said. "It's not like I grew up in that culture, and my mother didn't even teach me Spanish growing up. I just got the urge to paint."

Familiar colors of the season delayed by unusually warm weather

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Browns, yellows and oranges are expected throughout nature this time of year, but the weather is keeping those familiar fall colors from showing this season.

Ward Upham, instructor in horticulture, forestry and recreation resources, said the weather has been a lot warmer than usual, so the trees have not changed color yet. Some trees even already are dropping leaves.

"It all depends on the weather now," Upham said. "If it turns very cold very quickly, we won't see much."

Upham said many people associate the colors of fall with the foliage in New England.

"We usually don't have as good fall colors as New England," he said. "In New England, the oaks and maples tend to color better. The other thing is that they have the conditions that are nice for fall color."

Amanda Ebert, senior in modern languages, said the colors she expects to see in Kansas are browns, yellows and oranges during the fall season.

Ebert recently was in Maryland and saw the colors in the northeast region of the United States where there is more color variation.

"It was gorgeous," she said. "The trees were red, orange and yellow and were all vibrant colors."

Ebert said it is disappointing that the conditions of fall have not become apparent.

"It's kind of sad because I was looking forward to fall and the transition to cooler weather," she said.

Now, Ebert is worried there will be no transition and the weather will turn cold quickly.

Upham said the colors can differ each year depending on the year's weather. He said the conditions that produce colorful foliage are really warm sunny days and cool nights.

According to an Oct. 4, 2006, article by Upham in the horticulture department's newsletter, "the sunny days encourage photosynthesis and sugar accumulation in the leaves ... This high sugar content in the leaves produces more intense colors."

According to the article, plant pigments determine individual colors. The green colors of foliage are from chlorophyll, while the reds and purples are from anthocyanins. The yellows, oranges and browns are from other plant pigments.

"Most of these substances are present throughout the growing season but are masked by the green color produced by chlorophyll. Anthocyanins are the exception and are produced after the chlorophyll is destroyed in the fall," according to the article.

Upham said the colors of fall usually start to appear by October, but he said droughts in the summer and heavy rains in spring can have an effect on the color.

Depending on the weather, Upham said colorful foliage can last to the second week in November when frost covers the trees, but he said that also depends on the wind, which can take the leaves off trees quicker.

Mike Haddock, chair of the sciences department for K-State libraries, wrote, "Wildflowers and Grasses of Kansas: A Field Guide." Haddock guides interested visitors through the tallgrass prairies in the area to point out the species of the season.

Haddock said the colors in the prairie during the fall season are dominated by the greens, browns and straw colors of the tall grasses because they are the same height.

"There is a lot of variation of what you might encounter," Haddock said. "The amount of rainfall can affect how the plants are doing and how well they are blooming."

While colors are still apparent this season in the prairie, Haddock said not all the plants produce seeds every year, and that affects the plants seen more in a particular year.

The different species of the yellow goldenrod flowers can be seen throughout the prairies this season, and Haddock said he doesn't remember seeing as much of it in the past. Other flowers that add to the colors in the prairie are white, blue and purple flowers. However, the taller, colored plants like the goldenrod and sunflower are more apparent.

"I'm not sure you can really say a particular color predominates, but I think you're eyes are drawn to the yellow," Haddock said.

He said some of the plants in the tallgrass prairie can be found in many areas, but the tall grasses are found more in the eastern part of state because there is more moisture.

Once the cold weather and frost arrive, Haddock said the big bluestem tall grasses will turn a red color, and sometimes they stay that way yearlong.

University president takes leave of absence after accusations of illegal activity

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TULSA, Okla. — Oral Roberts University President Richard Roberts asked for and was granted a leave of absence Wednesday amid accusations of lavish spending at donors' expense and illegal involvement in a political campaign.

The 58-year-old son of the evangelist who founded the school said he would continue his role as chairman and chief executive of Oral Roberts Ministries, and denied what he said were untrue allegations.

"I don't know how long this leave of absence will last, but I fully trust the members of the Board of Regents," Roberts said in a news release issued by the university. "I pray and believe that in God's timing, and when the Board feels that it is appropriate, I will be back at my post as president."

The board said Billy Joe Daugherty, the senior pastor of Victory Christian Center in Tulsa, will temporarily assume the president's duties with help from Oral Roberts, 89, who is chancellor of the 5,700-student university but has left day-to-day operations to his son.

An Oct. 2 lawsuit filed by three former ORU professors says they were wrongfully dismissed and accuses Roberts of mispending at donors' expense, including numerous home remodels and a senior trip to the Bahamas for one daughter on the ministry's dime.

It also accuses Roberts of illegal involvement in a local political campaign, which would jeopardize the university's nonprofit status.

The professors say they were forced out after turning over this information to the ORU Board of Regents.

George Pearsons, the board's chairman, said he will meet Friday with the outside firm charged with investigating the allegations.

"Nothing is being swept under the rug, nothing is being hidden," he said late Wednesday.

The professors' suit was amended last week to include new allegations that documents were shredded and destroyed days after the initial lawsuit was filed, and hours after ORU and Richard Roberts fired the school's comptroller.

The amended complaint also included an internal ministry report, titled "Scandal Vulnerability Assessment," documenting allegations of misconduct by the university and the Roberts family. Only a partial report was included in the Oct. 2 lawsuit.

The more detailed account alleges Richard Roberts' wife, Lindsay, spent the night in the ORU guest house with an underage male "on nine separate occasions," and was photographed 29 times with an underage male in her sports car, among other allegations.

The internal report was prepared by Stephanie Cantees, Richard Roberts' sister-in-law. An ORU spokesman said Cantees would not comment on the report.

An ORU student repairing Cantees' laptop discovered the document and later provided a copy to one of the dismissed professors.

Extension services part of land-grant university tradition

By Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Above the fireplace in the Tointon Great Room at the K-State Alumni Center is the Bluemont College arch dating back to 1859. The arch once stood proudly in front of Memorial Field on a young, pioneer campus. After all, the university was one of the first of its kind.

GETTING STARTED

K-State was the first officially created — and now one of the nation's top 10 — land-grant universities, said Amy Button Renz, president of the K-State Alumni Association.

In 1863, K-State was founded as Bluemont College, later changing its name to Kansas State College of Agriculture and Applied Science in 1931 and finally Kansas State University in 1959, Button Renz said. K-State's founders were given land to develop a college in the Midwest, with its focus on engineering and agriculture, she said, making K-State the nation's first created land-grant university, following the institution of the land-grant acts.

Land-grant universities are institutions of higher education in the United States designated by Congress to receive the benefits of the Morrill Acts of 1862 and 1890, said Provost Duane Nellis.

"(K-State) is a people's university committed to providing access to higher education for all Kansans with an institutionalized commitment to contributing to the economic development and general well being of all Kansans," Nellis said.

The Morrill Act of 1862 established the land-grant university system, according to www.higher-ed.org. On July 2, 1862, President Abraham Lincoln signed the land-grant act into effect after U.S. Rep. Justin Smith Morrill of Vermont introduced this piece of legislation. The land-grant act, or First Morrill Act, granted 30,000 acres of public land to each state. This land then was divided between each senator and representative, based on the 1860 census. The proceeds from the sale of these lands were to be invested in a permanent endowment fund, which would provide support for colleges of agriculture and mechanical arts in each of the states, according to the higher-education Web site.

The Second Morrill Act passed about 30 years later when the government decided to apply a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to support colleges' of the agriculture and mechanic arts departments, according to the higher-education Web site.

In the 19th century, higher education was reserved for people of high financial status, said Ken Odde, head of the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry. The land-grant system was established to provide everyone with the opportunity to receive an education for a career, particularly in agriculture, he said.

"K-State is a first-class land-grant institution," Odde said, "but we can always improve and should be committed to improving."

STATE INVOLVEMENT

Odde said there are several active ways land-grant universities, including K-State, earn the funding they receive and give back to contributing communities, like cooperative extension programs and agricultural experiment stations.

Youth development and 4-H are a significant part of K-State's extension services, and there are extension branches in every county of the state, Odde said.

There is an agricultural experiment station located in Hays, Kan., that conducts research on beef cattle and is responsible for reporting its results through print publications and various other communication methods, Odde said.

"The tax payers are our audience," he said. "We live in a society where there is a lot of competition for the ear of the consumer. We are conscious of the fact that we have to constantly tell people what we're up to with our research and programs."

Besides extension and research, K-State's Department of Animal Sciences and Industry has a long history of service to the citizens of Kansas, Odde said.

There are two main ways the department specifically contributes to the land-grant cause, he said. Its first contribution is through animal agriculture. Animal agriculture refers to all industries that raise and feed animals that become part of the food supply, with the addition of equine.

The second contribution is through a large undergraduate department that emphasizes the education of the agriculturalists of the future, Odde said.

In August, the college was host to two significant 4-H youth development programs — a livestock judging contest and a meats identification judging program, Odde said. The college also uses these opportunities as tools to recruit for K-State. If students first experience university through 4-H, it is an opportunity for those students to see K-State up close and personal, he said.

Odde said he encourages K-State students who would like to get involved in extension to start out by simply marketing the school.

"Students who have had an outstanding undergraduate experience are the best ambassadors," Odde said. "There is no one better to talk to potential students and communicate opportunities to young folks."

MORE THAN JUST THE CORE

While agriculture and engineering were the original focus of K-State and the land-grant bill, it has broadened to include other colleges that contribute to the betterment of society, Nellis said.

The College of Human Ecology is an example of this expansion, said Paula Peters, assistant director of the cooperative extension of family and consumer sciences.

"(The College of Human Ecology) is a branch of the university visible in every county of the state," Peters said. "We contribute to the university in three ways — through teaching, research and cooperative extension."

The college's cooperative extension specializes in offering family services in various communities around the state, Peters said. The K-State branch's mission is to provide county agents and leaders with the information they require to educate citizens on their own well being, this is all driven by local needs, Peters said. For example, there are nutrition education programs for low-income families, classes for step-families learning to adjust and general parenting and finance classes for single parents.

"Our primary focus is to, like the university, provide education for the citizens of Kansas," Peters said.

Through extension programs, K-State remembers its roots, Nellis said. He said as an entrepreneurial university that educates students in an economical yet broad manner, K-State fulfills its land-grant responsibilities and provides every Kansan with the opportunity to learn.

Similar to K-State's extension programs, The Bluemont Arch in the Alumni Center reminds us of our humble beginnings as the first created land-grant university:

"The university was created to provide the working class with opportunities to achieve higher education," Nellis said. "Our mission is to focus on how knowledge can be applied to the bettering of society."

out with their cattle. He said he works about 20 hours a week on the ranch in addition to attending school full time and working 25 hours a week with a construction company.

But Sorrell said he does not mind the work on the ranch; he even looks forward to it.

"I just like the environment out there," he said. "It's peaceful, and I think it's fun."

In the future, both Sorrell and McCune said they hope to see the markets expand and hope to run their family farms partnering with their fathers.

"It's an open range out there," McCune said. "I get to call my own shots, and I love it."

Roozeboom said high prices and favorable weather have made for a successful harvest of corn, sunflower and cotton this year, but government policies and grain and oil prices are all subject to change without warning, so he said it is hard to tell how long the oasis will last.

"We had a hot, dry August in many parts of the state," Roozeboom said, "so I think that has made the soybean fields lower than they could have been. And if the rain keeps up to where (farmers) can't get it harvested for a long time, then the condition of the crop can deteriorate."

He also said farmers are concerned about an early frost with the state's recent precipitation and falling temperatures. For them, a frost means either a delayed or early harvest for crops like soybeans, which are not yet ready. Roozeboom said this has a drastic effect on the yield and revenues of the harvests because the crops would not be in their ideal conditions.

"You're always up against unpredictable weather," he said, "and what happens to the crop is largely out of your hands."

either him or the Republican Party."

By placing Brownback's name into the public view, Ramsey said he hopes it will open doors for Brownback in the future.

Rumors have begun regarding Brownback's possible run for Kansas Governor, the Herald reported.

Brownback will be the third Republican candidate this year permitted to participate in the presidential debates who then withdrew from the election process, according to Ballot Access News Online. The others were Gov. Tommy Thompson R-Wi., and

Gov. Jim Gilmore R-Va.

Democratic supporters believe that Brownback's removal from the election process was an intelligent move by the Republican Party.

"It was probably a good decision by him because I don't think he was right for the United States," said Whitney Steimel, sophomore in advertising and member of KSU Students Against Sam Brownback.

Steimel took special interest in Brownback's anti-abortion policies and said that was an important issue for her and will remain an issue as she votes for her democratic candidate of choice.

the museum for his wife, Marianna Kistler Beach, in honor of their 50th wedding anniversary. The couple are K-State alumni, and they donated $2 million to the museum.

The museum received accreditation from the American Association of Museums in 2002.

Two exhibitions at the museum also will open Sunday. The temporary exhibition "Paths to the Press: Printmaking and American Women Artists, 1910-60" is the first comprehensive review of U.S. women printmakers, and it also is the museum's longest-running exhibition, said Liz Seaton, the Beach Museum associate curator who edited the exhibit's accompanying catalog.

"It's a national survey of women who are active as printmakers in the 20th century, so it's a fairly large topic," she said. "We've mostly organized exhibits on individual artists, so this is a pretty large survey."

Seaton said she hopes students and community members will enjoy the temporary and permanent exhibitions featured at the museum.

"They're just going to be really amazed at the new spaces in which they are going to be able, I hope, to become friends with the art," she said. "The Sunday activities will give them a chance to really take them in and hopefully make them want to come back when they have more quiet time to really explore."

MARTIN | Coach takes unusual, lengthy route

"I wouldn't be sitting here as the head coach at Kansas State University if I was satisfied with being a junior-varsity basketball coach."

In some ways, Martin's stint as a junior-varsity coach isn't incredibly significant.

Most coaches, after all, get their start at the high-school level.

But that job reveals something profound about Frank Martin and what he brings to K-State's bench.

He started with nothing, the son of first-generation Cuban immigrants growing up in Miami. That taught him to work hard, no matter what the job.

It taught him to never be satisfied. It taught him to embrace a challenge.

It taught him that when opportunity comes, you grab a hold of it, and you don't let go.

"I want to coach at a place where people want to compete for championships, where it's hard," Martin said. "I don't like easy things. If I had to wake up every day and life was easy, I wouldn't have any fun. I'd be bored as hell."

YOUR LIFE

Curly hair causes headaches

All the people who told me they would die for my hair when I was younger obviously never had to deal with it on a daily basis.

I have extremely curly, thick hair that is almost impossible to tame. When I was younger, the only way to deal with it was by wearing it extremely short. When I was in sixth grade, I decided to grow it out — a process that took two years.

After it grew out, I encountered a catch-22 — there were more ways I could style my hair, but the length made it even harder to manage. With my hair being as thick as it is, it was almost impossible to straighten.

I attempted several methods to try and straighten my hair. I had it professionally chemically straightened, straightened out of a home kit and used curling irons and straightening creams with a blow dryer. Nothing worked. When I was a sophomore in high school, a friend from choir class introduced me to my new best friend.

She told me about a flat iron called the CHI, Ceramic Hair Iron. I saved up for a month and bought one from a hair salon and immediately loved it. The iron gets hot enough that it can tame even the wildest frizz, the kinkiest curls and also can get close to the scalp for best results. It's the flat iron the professionals use. Twenty minutes with that flat iron, and I could get my hair beautifully straight.

When I wash my hair, I spritz it afterward with John Frieda's Frizz-Ease Detangling Conditioner and brush it through. I still go to the hairstylist every three months to get my hair trimmed and thinned out — a process involving a special pair of scissors which cut pieces off of each strand.

Every six months, I also get my hair relaxed. The relaxer makes it less frizzy and easier to manage. Though my hair is chemically relaxed, it still needs extra attention to make it presentable.

Recently, I discovered a procedure so I can wear my hair curly. Immediately after getting out of the shower, I put the detangler in and brush it through. While it's still damp, I take a fairly good-sized amount of Garnier Curl Cream and apply it throughout my hair. Then, I put on a lot of hairspray, so when it dries, it will hold the curl. This formula helped erase a lot of problems with frizziness. Instead of having small curls that go everywhere, I have perfect curls that have enough weight and product in them to fall straight down.

My hair is a part of my life. Hopefully with these tips, I can help someone else learn how to tame their crazy curls.

Tips for staying dry and enjoying unexpected puddles

There's almost nothing worse than walking out of your two-hour lecture to find the sky has suddenly turned grey and has begun spitting rain.

Of course, it could not have been sunnier when you left your room that morning, but you're now caught without an umbrella on your 20-minute walk home while the sprinkle rapidly becomes a downpour.

Kansas in October yields dreary, unpredictable weather. That's why all students should never leave home without some sort of protection from the rain. Don't dismiss the idea of keeping dry because the thought of a huge, unattractive poncho comes to mind. There are many other options in rain gear for students keep you dry and looking good.

THE UMBRELLA

This should be an essential; never leave home without one. Always keep an umbrella tucked away in your purse, bag, backpack or whatever you take to class. This way, you are guaranteed to never again be caught in the stomach-dropping situation mentioned earlier.

Umbrellas come in all shapes and sizes, so it should be easy to find one that fits into a school bag compartment. However, be wary of the cute, 6-inch umbrellas that are almost too small and storable to be true.

Sure, they take up the least amount of space, but the wires are so thin and unstable that a medium-sized gust will force you to latch onto the handle for dear life while stealthfully angling the umbrella into the wind so it won't turn inside-out or end up with broken wires.

Choose your umbrella wisely. There are sturdy umbrellas that are available in smaller sizes. Don't get caught up in the cost factor — they're $3 for a reason.

RAIN JACKETS/PONCHOS

Though keeping an umbrella handy at all times is the best option, I wouldn't recommend carrying around a poncho or raincoat for spatial reasons, but stowing one away in the trunk or backseat of your car is always a good idea for other emergency-rain situations. If you're about to leave your residence and the rain clouds look somewhat promising, don't hesitate to add a little bulk to your bag by throwing in a poncho. Otherwise, just stick to the umbrella.

Ponchos are not the most appealing items, but they can be worn over your backpack in case of a shower to keep you and your backpack dry. But if you're more worried about style than practicality, opt for a waterproof jacket.

Many sports and fleece jackets come with a waterproof lining and or coating. North Face and Nike make extremely good-looking, all-purpose fleece coats, which keep out water and look like any normal fall or winter jacket.

If the rain already has turned into a downpour before you even leave your house, try wearing a button-up raincoat. Sure, these come in the classic sunshine yellow, but they also can be found in cute patterns such as polka-dot and stripe.

For men, these coats typically come in solid, cool colors like navy, black and hunter green, but there are some brighter options. If you want a bolder look and dig deep enough, you should be able to find some outrageous patterns.

BOOTS

Rubber boots are my favorite rainy-day accessory. They are so practical yet so trendy at the same time. For women, they come in a variety of bright colors and patterns and are available at almost every shoe store. They can be found for around $25 at stores like Target all the way to $170 from designers like Burberry.

No matter which boot you choose, they all keep your feet, socks and pants dry while expressing your personal style through color and design.

BICYCLE FLAPS

According to BikeHugger.com, bike flaps also express your sense of style.

"What you make the flap from tends to say a little about you," according to the site.

Bike flaps — or mud flaps — come in a variety of materials from leather to plastic and can be personalized through bike shops and Web sites like bikehugger.com. These should be an essential for every bike-riding student. Not only do these accessories protect your rear-end from wet roads and puddles, they also will protect your ego. You'll be able to avoid those awkward moments where you're walking into class after cycling to campus on a rainy day looking like you just drank five cups of coffee and couldn't make it to a bathroom.

So no matter which rain-savvy items best fit your life and personal style, follow these tips for looking good and staying dry the next time you find yourself caught in the rain.

RETURN OF THE MOB?

K-State had no trouble stopping the run in its first four games, ranking No. 11 in the nation. During the game at Texas, the defense began to look like it did in the mid '90s when it was ranked as high as No. 1 in the nation. But in the last two games, poor tackling and other problems have plagued the Wildcats. The rush defense has to improve if K-State hopes to win at Oklahoma State, which has the No. 6 rush offense in the nation.

OFF THE FIELD | WIDE RECEIVER DANIEL GONZALEZ

Senior wide receiver Daniel Gonzalez is a native of Augusta, Kan., and went to Andover Central High School. While there, he had a job at his uncle's donut shop, which he admitted was the worst job he's ever had. Gonzalez, a walk-on from Independence (Kan.) Community College, took the time to do an interview for this week's Off The Field. He discussed his former girlfriends, his love for Nintendo and some of his nicknames.

Do you listen to any music before the game to get you hyped up?

Actually, I try to. I get into the locker room and I take all my stuff out and I'm just getting ready. I kind of lose everything, so I don't really listen to anything unless someone besides me is listening to something. So I guess sometimes I do and sometimes I don't.

Who plays the loudest music in the locker room before the game?

Deon Murphy. Whether it's his music or him singing something.

What made you decide to come to K-State?

Actually, it wasn't too hard. This is where I wanted to go out of high school. I had talked to K-State out of high school. They just wanted me to walk on. I figured I'd go and get some playing time and try to get some reps (at Independence Community College). As soon as I got done there they wanted me to come up here and I really didn't want to go anywhere else.

So you grew up a big K-State fan?

Actually, honestly, my whole family's KU and a girl that I was dating was a big K-State fan and turned me to K-State. We always went to K-State games when we were younger. Coming to games, the atmosphere just got me. Ever since then I always wanted to play at K-State.

So you're not dating that girl anymore?

No, but she is a good girl though. You can write that down.

What do you do around Manhattan for fun?

I worked at Tubby's over the summer. I don't know, that is a good place to hang out with friends. I play every Nintendo ever made. Watch TV and hang out with friends, I guess.

Do you play NCAA Football a lot?

Actually no, I don't really like playing sports games. I really like more of the tactical, like shoot'em games.

So you have probably played Halo 3 by now?

Yep, you got it.

I know my roommates play it for like seven hours, so how long do you play it?

I try to play, but my roommates are always playing it. So whenever I get a chance when they're not playing it.

Do you like being called Gonzo?

Everybody calls me that, so I don't really care. I have like 200 freaking different nicknames.

How long have you had Gonzo?

I mean, shoot, ever since middle school. People would call me Gonzo. Everywhere I went, that is the first thing they would call me. Gonzo, Gonzo, Gonzo.

You blocked a punt this past weekend that was recovered for a touchdown; you have recovered a blocked punt for a touchdown; and you have caught a touchdown – which would you rather do?

I don't know. I think it is a bigger deal when it is a blocked pick-up or, I mean, I think I liked it more when it got blocked and I picked it up or when I blocked it and someone else picked it up. It's awesome. I don't know. It is all the same to me.

Does it hurt to block a punt?

Nope. That one didn't. I'm kind of surprised it didn't because I just threw my arm out.

How was it working at Tubby's this summer?

I don't know. The hours are kind of weird working 'til 2 or 2:30 in the morning. It was fun. It was a blast. Nowadays it is sometimes about who you know, so it is not bad to get your name out there.

What was the worst job you have ever had?

I worked in a donut shop when I was in high school. My uncle owned it, but I did the dishes and I hated it. But it was for my family and it was fun to help. I think that is the worst job I had.

Did you eat a lot of donuts while you were there?

Yeah, and I really don't like donuts anymore. I ate so many of those. I don't eat donuts very often, but when I do, I eat a lot.

Since you go up against the corners almost every day, who is the best trash talker?

Hmm. I don't know. I don't know that any of them really talk trash that much. (Ray) Cheatham doesn't talk at all, really. Maybe J-Mac (Justin McKinney) or J-Mo – Josh Moore.

Who trash talks the most from the wide receivers?

Deon. Deon just likes to talk and likes to hear himself talk.

OFFENSE

James Johnson could reach the 100-yard mark again matching up against Oklahoma State, which is allowing 122.4 rushing yards per game. Despite only completing 15 passes last game, Josh Freeman found seven different receivers. The Cowboys will likely focus on Jordy Nelson, so Freeman will have to spread the ball around again and get it in the hands of Deon Murphy, who is always a threat to score.

Dantrell Savage has four straight 100-yard games since returning from injury. Savage should find open holes against a K-State defense that has struggled against the run lately. Aided by the mobility of quarterback Zac Robinson, the Cowboys' offensive line has allowed just seven sacks. Robinson has the ability to escape the Wildcats' pressure and turn broken plays into first downs.

DEFENSE

K-State needs to solve its problems stopping the run quickly, or Dantrell Savage could have another big day. The Wildcats can't lose track of Adarius Bowman or the other Cowboy receivers, though. It is imperative that the K-State front seven gets to Zac Robinson — and finishes the tackle — before he can escape the pocket. Despite their 20 sacks this season, the Wildcats have had trouble with quarterbacks breaking containment.

The Cowboys are No. 83 in the nation in total defense, but they have allowed an average of only 13.6 points in the last three games. Defensive end Nathan Peterson is Oklahoma State's best tool to stop K-State's running game. Peterson has seven tackles for loss and two sacks this season. Linebacker Donovan Woods — a former quarterback, wide receiver and safety — is third on the team in tackles and has two forced fumbles.

SPECIAL TEAMS

Kicker Brooks Rossman — the Big 12 Special Teams Player of the Week — booted a season-long 52-yard field goal against Colorado. Coach Ron Prince said a kicker with that kind of range makes a defense adjust its game plan. Rossman continues to show his power and consistency, connecting on 13 of 16 attempts. Rossman's reliability gives K-State the advantage in a close game.

Kicker Jason Ricks is six of 10 this season, with his longest field goal coming from 32 yards. Without a reliable option in the field-goal department, Oklahoma State will be forced to punt often to a dangerous K-State return team. Already allowing a punt return touchdown, the Cowboys must focus their attention on keeping the ball out of the hands of Deon Murphy and Jordy Nelson.

PREDICTION

Traveling to Boone Pickens Stadium during Oklahoma State's homecoming will be no easy task for K-State. However, the Wildcats are coming off their best Big 12 offensive performance, so look for them to match the Cowboys' offense play for play. With the game likely being decided by turnovers, expect the K-State secondary to make a game-changing play.

K-State in a rush to put an end to run-stopping inconsistencies

By Jonathan Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's defense was once its backbone. Now, it seems to be its Achilles' heel.

Through the first four games — two of which were on the road — the Wildcats ranked 11th in the nation in rush defense, allowing 79 yards per game. Two weeks and two home games later, K-State is ranked No. 31, giving up 675 yards and five touchdowns this season.

Apparently home-field advantage isn't much of a factor for K-State's rush defense.

Coach Ron Prince said the Wildcats' defensive performance against Colorado and Kansas were far from spectacular. However, he did acknowledge some of K-State's breakdowns last week against the Buffaloes were partly because of strategy.

"There was a way that we were going to have to win the game, and it was going to be giving up some yards," Prince said. "We're not really particularly in the mindset to ever play a bend-but-don't-break style, but the situation that we found ourselves in kind of forced us to do that."

K-State, which defeated Colorado 47-20, allowed 188 yards rushing on 5.2 yards per carry. It also yielded 223 yards through the air.

"We were playing with a lead, so we could afford to do some things offensively to not put ourselves in risk," Prince said. "Had we not had the lead and had things been a little different in that game, we'd have been put in the situation to kind of force the issue a little bit."

This week, K-State might not have the luxury of playing with a lead.

Oklahoma State rolled over Nebraska 45-14 Saturday, and has an offense that ranks No. 12 in the country.

"We're going to try to correct on both ends style-wise on how we play this week," Prince said. "We can not just be one-dimensional."

The Wildcats will certainly face a tough test against the Cowboys, whose 246.3 rushing yards-per-game average ranks sixth in the nation.

Running back Dantrell Savage leads the Cowboys' rushing attack, totaling 622 yards and three touchdowns this season. After returning from injury, Savage has rushed for more than 100 yards in his last four games, including 212 yards on 25 carries against Nebraska last week.

"Their (running backs) are good, and I'm sure they're going to pose a threat for us," safety Marcus Watts said. "Hopefully we'll shore up the tackling and the beating blocks stuff so that we can stop it."

Though it's no consolation to Prince, the Wildcats' rush defense has performed well on the road.

In two away games, they have allowed just 175 yards total — an average of 87.5 yards per game.

Despite K-State's earlier performances, linebackers Justin Roland and Ian Campbell aren't satisfied with what has happened the last two weeks. They aren't afraid to accept the blame, either.

"Us. That's the problem," Campbell said. "We're not tackling them when we're there, and that's obviously a very important key to playing defense."

Roland said the win obviously matters more than the yards, but Oklahoma State might prove to be a tougher opponent than Colorado.

"We can't give up 200 yards against good teams and expect to win," Roland said. As a captain for the Wildcats, Campbell's message got right to the point.

"Guys have to step up," he said. "It's that simple."

Hard-working Johnson a good barometer for Wildcats' success

Jordy Nelson has put up the most impressive numbers for K-State this season.

He has 56 receptions for 727 yards. He made his way onto Sports Illustrated's Midseason All-America Team. He's obviously the best player for the Wildcats, but his individual success hasn't dictated the overall success of the team.

RYNE WITT

In K-State's two losses, Nelson had an average of 9.5 receptions for 113.5 yards. In the four victories, he averaged 9.3 receptions and 125 yards. How's that for consistency?

Nelson is certainly consistent. Without him, K-State's offense wouldn't work.

However, there is another player on the team whose statistics more directly correlate to the team winning or losing.

When running back James Johnson does well, the team wins.

Last season, K-State averaged 315.2 yards per game, and Johnson only totaled 403 rushing yards. Halfway through 2007 he has rushed for 505 yards on 88 carries, or 5.7 yards per attempt.

Coach Ron Prince has repeatedly praised Johnson for being one of the hardest-working individuals on the team, and that work ethic has shown this year. He has noticeably gained some muscle and is demonstrating good field vision, something that wasn't evident much of last year.

Johnson has improved so much that he's now the go-to guy when the Wildcats run. There's only one problem: When they don't establish Johnson, or when he doesn't do well, the Wildcats lose.

In the loss at Auburn, Johnson rushed for a measly 14 yards on seven carries.

Yes, only two yards per carry. Against Kansas he had 11 carries for 30 yards, or 2.7 yards per attempt. So he is averaging 22 yards in losses, but what about in wins?

In K-State's four victories, Johnson has averaged 17.5 carries for 115.3 yards on 6.4 yards per rush. Plus, he had all seven of his touchdowns in those games.

If the Wildcats want to win more games, they need to establish Johnson early and often. I've heard the quote, "Pass to score and run to win," come from almost every offensive player's mouth.

They demonstrated that mindset against Colorado. They racked up 249 yards rushing, most of it in the final quarter-and-a-half.

Johnson had a 68-yard touchdown run during that time. K-State's rushing game solidified the 47-20 victory.

Johnson's success isn't only on his shoulders, because for him to have a good day, the offensive line has to create some running lanes. Also, the coaches' game plan has to include Johnson. When it does, it always seems to be successful. They need to give Johnson the ball, especially this weekend against Oklahoma State. The Cowboys are giving up 122.4 yards per game on the ground, and they have one of the most dangerous offenses in college football. If Johnson establishes himself, K-State will score points, which will keep the Cowboys' high-scoring offense off the field.

And if that happens, the Wildcats will probably get another win. It will again be because of Johnson.

Rossman getting his kicks in at K-State after rough go in Ohio

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One new face to the K-State football team brought experience he gleaned from various places, including a former NFL kicker and former Nebraska coach Frank Solich.

It's kicker Brooks Rossman, and he is building quite a résumé through his six games as a Wildcat.

He is ranked No. 1 in the Big 12 Conference in field goal percentage, making 13 of 16 attempts on the year. Last Saturday, he hit four of five field goals and was rewarded this week's Big 12 Special Teams Player of the Week.

At home in San Diego, Rossman likes to surf. There's many differences between California and the Midwest, especially in the weather, he said.

During his teenage years at Los Alamitos High, he trained under former NFL kicker Michael Husted.

"He just keeps me sane," Rossman said. "He's been a really great motivator, and I owe a lot to him."

Rossman, a transfer from Ohio University, first saw the national spotlight when his Bobcats stunned Pittsburgh in overtime, 16-10, in September 2005.

"That was a really amazing experience," he said. "I still think about it to this day — that overtime win on ESPN. It really put Ohio in the national light."

Rossman said he chose Ohio because of the chance to see playing time as a freshman. The Ohio coaching staff under Solich initially had a positive reaction to Rossman.

"Our impression was he had a great, strong leg," Ohio defensive coordinator Jimmy Burrow said. "His consistency during the course of the season wasn't what we were looking for, but we knew he had great potential."

While the Ohio staff knew Rossman had consistency in practice, Burrows said it was his game performance that eventually made them decide to release him.

Husted said he and Rossman debated on where he should go after Ohio, eventually deciding that K-State was a program worth considering. Rossman wanted a change, and Manhattan fit the bill.

"We didn't do so well the first two years I was at Ohio, and I wanted a change of venue," he said. "I met coach Tibesar and came out on a visit, really liked what I saw and here I am."

"Every single place in this town is 100 percent behind the football team. That's something that I've never experienced before and it's great."

Rossman has been working with Husted since he was a freshman in high school. Husted played nine seasons in the NFL, mostly with the Tampa Bay Buccaneers. After spending his final season in Kansas City, Husted felt like he could give his pupil some perspective on life in the Midwest.

Brooks Rossman (16) nails a career-long 52-yard field goal just before halftime against Colorado. Rossman is 13 of 16 this season, which ranks No. 1 in the Big 12 in field-goal percentage. A former kicker at Ohio University, Rossman transferred to K-State in 2006.

Christopher Hanewinkel
COLLEGIAN

"They're in the Midwest, so they love football," Husted said. "K-State has a great campus and is in a college town. Those towns are there because of the university. I gave him more of what to expect and what college was like. You're there to play football and balance your time accordingly."

Prior to each game, Rossman and Husted speak on the phone about the upcoming game. Rossman tries to extract Husted's knowledge.

"I've taken the experience that I learned during my nine years in the NFL and shared that with him," Husted said. "Kicking is 80 to 90 percent mental. That's where you see the people that are special ... the people who have trained mentally as well as physically."

Kickers are often cast as outsiders on teams. They aren't as involved as other players. But they can often be the difference between a win and a loss. Coach Ron Prince said he doesn't mind the kicker's personality as long as he performs.

"He's a pretty cool customer, and he along with (Jeff Snodgrass) are interesting people," Prince said. "They're just interesting characters, those kickers. There's nothing particularly wacky about him, but I think they march to a little bit different drummer. I'm just really pleased that he makes the kicks when we ask him to."

When he does hit the field, Rossman has proven that he is capable of doing his job. He said being on a team so special teams-oriented is refreshing.

"I think in this program, we really harp on special teams as being the most important out of the three phases," he said. "Coach Prince is always saying if you aren't going to play on special teams, you aren't going to play on offense or defense. I think the guys on this team really respect special teams, and they've been doing an awesome job in all phases."

Rossman is tied for second nationally, with an average of more than two made field goals per game. Eighty-one percent of the time he sets up for an attempt, he nails it through the uprights. He said he has more range than the 52-yarder he converted last Saturday.

He's getting better with each game, at a position he said isn't as easy as it looks.

"It's an individual position and you have to go out there, block everything out and be confident," he said. "If there's any doubt in your mind that you're not going to make it, you're probably not going to make it."

KEYS TO VICTORY

1. NO FIRST-HALF FALTERS

K-State has been able to get off to fast starts this season, scoring first in all six of its games. Taking that lead into halftime, though, seems to be of much greater importance. Consider this: in the 18 games the Wildcats have played under coach Ron Prince, they are 10-0 when leading at half. Seven of the eight losses, however, have come when the team is trailing. That's not a statistic they want to be messing with if they hope to steal a road win at Oklahoma State.

2. SLOW SAVAGE

Oklahoma State running back Dantrell Savage has four straight 100-yard games since returning from a groin injury. If he had played in 75 percent of the Cowboys' games, Savage would be ninth in the country in rushing yards per game. When asked to compare Savage to another running back, Prince came up with NFL players Steven Jackson, Laurence Maroney and Marion Barber. So obviously it will be a difficult task for the K-State defense to slow this guy down. But the Wildcats will have to find a way to shut down the running game, like they were doing in the first four games this season.

3. JUMP START WITH JOHNSON

K-State's strategy so far has been to use the short passes to set up the run. Against Colorado, the Wildcats ran more times than they passed for the first time, with 39 rushes and 28 pass attempts. That new strategy was effective, as K-State put up its second-highest point total of the year. When James Johnson gets a chance to establish himself early, it helps the entire offense. Against Oklahoma State, it will also serve to keep the Cowboys' 12th-ranked offense on the sideline.

4. STAY RED-HOT IN THE RED ZONE

K-State is second in the Big 12 in red-zone efficiency, scoring on 24 of 26 trips, or 92.3 percent. Only Missouri is better. What's even more remarkable is only nine of those scores were field goals, meaning the Wildcats have had no trouble punching it in when they get in scoring range. In a game that will likely be high-scoring, K-State has to continue this efficiency and not settle for short field goals when close to the goal line. The worst scenario, however, would be a costly turnover in the red zone.

5. HANDLE HOMECOMING

It's always tough to play against any school on Homecoming Saturday, but the Cowboys' traditions run a little deeper than most. K-State is 4-9 all-time when playing on Oklahoma State's homecoming. With the Cowboys winning three of their last four, including a 45-14 thumping at Nebraska, the fans will probably be extra pumped for this one. That means the Wildcats need to get ahead early and take the crowd out of the game.

OKLAHOMA STATE MEDIA RELATIONS

Boone Pickens Stadium seats more than 44,000 fans, but it is undergoing renovations. On Saturday it will be host to Oklahoma State's homecoming game against K-State.

Homecoming takes center stage at Oklahoma State this weekend

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ask an Oklahoma State alumnus why homecoming is so big in Stillwater and they might tell you words can't explain the importance of the festival.

Then they will probably suggest you go for yourself.

With traditions dating back to 1913, homecoming has grown into a huge event for OSU.

Carrie Trentham, a 2002 graduate and former member for the homecoming executive team, said the excitement around homecoming at OSU is different from other schools that don't have as much tradition.

Trentham works for UNLV, where she said homecoming is treated quite differently.

"At OSU, whenever it is homecoming, everyone knows it is homecoming," she said. "The institution that I work at now, the knowledge and excitement about homecoming is not nearly the same."

There are events for everyone at homecoming, including the popular Sea of Orange Parade and the Walkaround.

The parade typically has at least 175 entries and features several bands from within the state. Because Trentham played a role in planning the parade for the homecoming executives, it became one of her favorite events.

"I am a little biased as a student," Trentham said. "One of the things I was always excited about was the parade, and that was partially because I planned it."

The Walkaround event usually draws the largest crowd. Because of that, it's easy to rub shoulders with an old friend or colleague.

"It is always kind of funny when you walk around, because you can do it with a group of people, but it is really hard because someone sees someone they know and they have to stop," Trentham said. "Ultimately you stand around waiting and get separated."

During the Walkaround, visitors walk down the streets along Greek houses and residence areas and view elaborate decorations. Some of them include robotic and mechanical figures that are dressed up.

Missy Calvery, a Wichita resident and 1996 OSU grad, is married to a K-State alumnus. She said the homecoming game being against the Wildcats has opened up some friendly trash talk.

Even their kids get involved.

"We used to say they could wear whatever color they wanted to, but I didn't keep up my end of the bargain in Manhattan," Calvery said. "We compromise with an Oklahoma State shirt and Kansas State pants, and we get a lot of attention."

Calvery said it's nearly impossible for out-of-towners to find a hotel in Stillwater during homecoming weekend. That's why she always chooses to drive back and forth with her husband each year.

"I don't know how people find out ahead of time, but they do," she said. "And as soon as it's announced, you call and the hotel rooms are gone."

Part of the reason Calvery believes the celebration continues to grow each year is the inclusion of the new Alumni Center.

Calvery said being an alum has opened her eyes to the traditions, more so than when she was a student.

"When I was a student, I don't know that I saw the whole picture of it," she said. "I was in a sorority, so I knew there was something that we just had to do. But the Alumni Center has given everyone a spot to gather, and that has helped."

No matter how good or bad the Cowboys are on a year-to-year basis, the alumni always come back to support the school, and tradition ultimately prevails.

"Oklahoma State is big on tradition, so anything they can take pride in and get tradition they do," Calvery said. "I think with time it is just evolving and getting bigger and growing, so it just keeps growing with the generations."

Gundy outburst still drawing attention, even in TV ads

By Mike DeVader
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Oklahoma State coach Mike Gundy defended former starting quarterback Bobby Reid in a post-game press conference three weeks ago, he portrayed a striking resemblance to that of Texas Tech basketball coach Bob Knight.

But even Knight, famous for his outbursts, seems to know when to pick his spots.

Gundy's tirade came at an unusual time — after a win.

Not only did he lecture and verbally attack Daily Oklahoman columnist Jenni Carlson for her negative column about Reid, but he carried on for more than three minutes.

The blowup quickly became a YouTube hit, and the video has received more than 500,000 views since it was posted. There's been spinoffs, too, everything from fake Coors Light commercial spots to radio skits.

It didn't take long for the video to make its way to Norman, Okla., the site of in-state rival Oklahoma's campus.

The video landed at Fowler Toyota, a car dealership in Norman. The company's advertising department saw the press conference, and thought the rant could be used as a marketing tactic to sell cars.

"They really liked the intensity that Gundy had," said Jay Wilson, general sales manager at Fowler Toyota. "They must have looked at the video of it like 100 times, because for this commercial to work, we had to do it the right way."

Wilson said the commercial was nothing out of the ordinary for Fowler Toyota, which is always looking for clever ways to advertise.

"Our advertising here has always been creative," Wilson said. "We have also done commercials based off shows like 'C.S.I.' and 'Law and Order.'"

So far, Wilson said, the car commercial seems to be receiving positive reviews.

"I would say that 99 per-

Oklahoma State coach Mike Gundy made national news earlier this season when he erupted during his post-game press conference following a victory over Texas Tech. One month later, Gundy's tirade is still being viewed on YouTube, and a car dealership in Norman, Okla., even made a spoof commercial.

OKLAHOMA STATE MEDIA RELATIONS

cent of the viewers loved the commercial on YouTube," Wilson said. "Local members might have thought of it as more of a joke, but we certainly didn't. I would say that the overall acceptance here was about 80 percent."

Wilson said Fowler Toyota has a storied history in Norman, and the commercial didn't necessarily lead to more car sales.

"I just think that for over 30 years we have always been good at selling cars," Wilson said. "People might come into the dealership and mention that they saw the commercial, but I think the commercial works best just for keeping the Fowler name fresh in the minds of customers."

Gundy's outburst might have been a good way to advertise, but how has it affected fans and students of Oklahoma State?

Adrienne Carraway, a K-State graduate and life-long Cowboys fan, said her dad, who played on the OSU football team from 1968 to 1973, wishes he could have played for a coach like Gundy.

"He wishes he would've played for a man half of what Gundy is," Carraway said. "He encompasses characteristics that all coaches should have, especially when it comes to the treatment and portrayal of their players."

John Andrews, current OSU student, said he believes Gundy did the right thing.

"He came off brash, but the reporter had it coming," he said. "The whole campus is behind Gundy all the way."

Police suspect child abuse

By Allison Voris
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A 3-month-old Manhattan boy was taken into protective custody Thursday after being treated for injuries believed to be caused by abuse, Riley County police said.

Riley County Police Department Capt. Brad Schoen said the infant was taken into custody after employees at Kentucky Fried Chicken noticed a gash on the child's head and notified the police.

RCPD also received information from the Kansas Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services about concerns of the boy being treated inappropriately by his 20-year-old mother, Schoen said.

Schoen said the child was treated for new and old injuries including a broken arm, bruises and a fractured skull. He said there was also evidence that indicates sexual abuse.

An 18-year-old Riley, Kan., man is facing charges after showing obscene photos of himself to minors, Riley County Police said.

Riley County Police Department Capt. Brad Schoen said Benjamin Ochoa is facing potential charges of two counts of sexual exploitation of a child and three counts of promoting obscenity after he had a 14-year-old male take photos of himself having sex with a 17-year-old girl. He then displayed these pictures to a group of 14-year-olds.

Ochoa's bond was set at $5,000.

Alleged thief wrecks car

An Ogden, Kan., man might face charges of motor vehicle theft and driving with a canceled or suspended license after a roll-over accident, Riley County Police Department officials said.

Capt. Brad Schoen said police were dispatched to Fort Riley Boulevard, near Stag Hill Road, at about 2:30 a.m. for a report of an injury accident.

Schoen said when officers arrived, a 2002 Chevy Impala was unoccupied. RCPD contacted the owner of the car, 88-year-old George Schmidt of 2121 Meadowlark Road, who then realized his car was missing from his residence.

Schoen said a K-9 unit was then brought to the scene and was able to find the vehicle's driver, 30-year-old Austin Erickson, hiding in some trees off the road.

Erickson was transported to Mercy Regional Health Center with unidentified injuries. Schoen said alcohol might have contributed to the accident.

In a frenzy of costumed balloon artists, sequined party hats, artistic sidewalk-chalk creations, grilled hamburgers, the classical tinkling of a piano and flashy magic tricks, students, community members and museum coordinators celebrated the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art's expansion and grand reopening Sunday.

In an effort to expose the various demographics of Manhattan to the museum's new additions, the Beach Museum provided events from 11 a.m. to 7 p.m. with the theme "Art's Up!" Museum coordinators chose a variety of festive, art-related events to excite and inform attendees about the museum, said Kathrine Walker Schlageck, museum senior-education coordinator.

"The purpose of today is to celebrate with Manhattan's residents and K-State students about our reopening and display our beautiful new expansions," Walker Schlageck said. "Everything we planned is creative and art-related, but it's not just focused on fine art. We really wanted to emphasize fun art this year."

The coordinators planned the day's activities to attract a variety of different audiences, said Martha Scott, the museum's business and marketing manager.

THIS WEEK | A look at events that occurred during this week in history

TODAY 1962: CUBAN MISSILE CRISIS

In a televised speech of extraordinary gravity, President John F. Kennedy announced U.S. spy planes had discovered Soviet missile bases in Cuba.

These missile sites — under construction but nearing completion — housed medium-range missiles capable of striking a number of major cities in the United States, including Washington, D.C. Kennedy announced he was ordering a naval "quarantine" of Cuba to prevent Soviet ships from transporting any more offensive weapons to the island and explained that the United States would not tolerate the existence of the missile sites in place.

The president made it clear the United States would not stop short of military action to end what he called a "clandestine, reckless and provocative threat to world peace."

TUESDAY 2002: HOSTAGE CRISIS IN MOSCOW

About 50 Chechen rebels stormed a Moscow theater, taking about 700 people hostage during a sold-out performance of a popular musical.

The second act of the musical "Nord Ost" was just beginning at the Moscow Ball-Bearing Plant's Palace of Culture when an armed man walked onstage and fired a machine gun into the air.

The terrorists — including a number of women with explosives strapped to their bodies — identified themselves as members of the Chechen Army.

They had one demand: that Russian military forces begin an immediate and complete withdrawal from Chechnya, the war-torn region located north of the Caucasus Mountains.

THURSDAY 1881: PICASSO BORN

Pablo Picasso, one of the greatest and most influential artists of the 20th century, was born in Malaga, Spain.

Picasso's father was a professor of drawing, and he bred his son for a career in academic art. Picasso had his first exhibit at age 13 and later quit art school so he could experiment full-time with modern art styles.

He went to Paris for the first time in 1900, and in 1901 was given an exhibition at a gallery on Paris' rue Lafitte, a street known for its prestigious art galleries.

FRIDAY 1881: SHOOTOUT AT THE OK CORRAL

The Earp brothers faced off against the Clanton-McLaury gang in a legendary shootout at the OK Corral in Tombstone, Arizona.

After silver was discovered nearby in 1877, Tombstone quickly grew into one of the richest mining towns in the Southwest.

Wyatt Earp, a former Kansas police officer working as a bank security guard, and his brothers, Morgan and Virgil, the town marshal, represented "law and order" in Tombstone, though they also had reputations as being power-hungry and ruthless. The Clantons and McLaurys were cowboys who lived on a ranch outside of town and sidelined as cattle rustlers, thieves and murderers.

Panelists address institutional, societal racism in discussion

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Racism has been institutionalized and implanted into U.S. society, a K-State student said during a panel discussion on racial incidents and discrimination Friday afternoon.

Kristen Wilkes, junior in sociology, said societal action is necessary to undo the effects of historical incidents of racism that are evident today.

"Until we as a people take actions to keep people from being in the same situations that they're in because of things that have happened in the history and past and their refusing to change things, it's going to continue to exist," she said.

Wilkes, along with three other K-State students and four faculty members, participated in a panel discussion in the K-State Student Union Courtyard as part of Black Student Union's "X'ed Out of Society." The all-day event included a silent demonstration and a rally in Bosco Student Plaza prior to the panel discussion.

Students wore an "x" on their black T-shirts and stood in two lines during the rally while listening to each others' stories and experiences about being "X'ed" out of society. "He (she) came to be heard" was exclaimed in unison after each participant told a personal story.

John Exdell, associate professor of philosophy, started the panel discussion with his definition of racism. He said racism differs in its application to individuals and its application to society as a whole.

"If we are talking simply about individuals, I think a good way to define the term is people who have hostile, inferior rising attitudes or beliefs about racial groups," he said. "If they treat them or feel about them with attitudes of contempt or disdain or a lack of concern about their welfare, that should count as racism."

A societal definition of racism involves looking at the individual racism definition, its attitudes and how they systematically are included in society, Exdell said.

Donald Saucier, assistant professor of psychology, said his research examines racism and how it has changed over time. While it still is a significant societal issue, Saucier said racism has changed its form.

"It used to be a very, very blatant, overt kind of expression, negativity of one person toward another group," he said. "What's happened now is we're starting to find that the behaviors that are part of racism's definition are now having other justifications for the same behavior."

Instead of saying a decision like job-hiring is made based on race, Saucier said people resort to different rationales and excuses.

"Racism has definitely remained in society, but we have to change the way we think about it," he said. "It's actually kind of gone underground, become more covert and potentially more insidious because we can't necessarily see it operating as easily."

Student panel members included Joshua Criswell, junior in social science; Letitia Tajuba, senior in political science; Nick Piper, senior in finance; and Wilkes.

Other faculty panel members included Juanita McGowan, American Ethnic Studies Program director; and Kimetris Baltrip, Kansas State Collegian adviser and assistant professor of journalism and mass communications.

Racism exists globally, which often is overlooked in the United States, Baltrip

Pet lovers raise funds for dog's surgery with humane society auction

By Brandon Steinert
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Gomer the kitten has a cyst in his chest the size of his heart, and the Riley County Humane Society held a silent auction last Friday to help pay for his surgery.

Participants watched a dog fashion show and participated in the auction that featured a variety of items, including Xbox gaming systems, bedding and grilling equipment, paintings by dogs, and pet-food baskets.

This was the RCHS third-annual silent auction, and all proceeds went to the society. Dillard's, CD TradePost, Dannenberg Jewelers and many other businesses - small and corporate - donated various items to the society to be auctioned off, said RCHS co-chair Elizabeth Wood.

"Dannenberg Jewelers always gives us a Powercat necklace, and it always brings in good money," Wood said. "All the cosmetology places really help us out too."

Wood and her co-chair, Tara McConkey, organize the auction every year.

The dog fashion show is a new attraction that has been added to the event, McConkey said.

Owners dressed their dogs in costumes from different eras in history. For example, RCHS members Rich and Amy Brusk dressed their German Shepard, Chase, as a "biker dude," and their Husky, Mogly, in a Japanese kimono.

The fashion show winner was an American Bulldog named Jayne, owned by RCHS member Amanda Taylor, who works with the College of Veterinary Medicine.

Jayne strutted down the catwalk as the "punk-rock pooch" clad in a rock-'n'-roll outfit, toting a pink cardboard guitar.

"The costumes will be put up for auction with everything else after the show," said Nicole DeMaranville, senior in business management.

DeMaranville said she was participating in the event as a member of Wildcats for Pet Adoption and Welfare.

"This is the first year we've been able to help out," she said.

Several awards also were given. One award went to CD TradePost owner Jeff Uhlarik for being an excellent small-business supporter in many ways, including advertisements within his store. The Manhattan Aquarium also received this award.

Some individuals received awards for being exceptional animal foster parents. The award of "Lifetime Achievement Pet-Rescue Volunteer" went to Lisa Bryant and Madelyn Short. The "Foster Parent of the Year" award went to RCHS member Clyde Oesterhaus.

"The dogs that come from him are always calm and tame, which is amazing considering he takes in mostly larger dogs," Wood said.

A love for animals was a common theme among participants and guests, and RCHS member Jennifer Fleeker said that was her reason for attending.

"I came because I adore animals, and the RCHS can use the money," Fleeker said. "Gomer really needs a surgery."

Elizabeth Stillion, Manhattan resident, looks at silent auction items with her friends and dog Maddox during the third-annual Riley County Humane Society charity event Friday evening.

Party of principles?

Republican candidates should allow history to repeat itself

When politicians campaign, they often speak about their principles. They say their decisions are based on their rock-solid beliefs and usually their respective faiths too. But what is one to do when one's principles will in fact hinder one's campaign? To see this example in the real world, we don't have to look hard.

Three of the top four Republican presidential candidates either have been accused of flip-flopping or "not being conservative enough."

According to Reuters on Oct. 18, Lee Miringoff, a pollster at the Marist Institute for Public Opinion, said John McCain, Rudy Giuliani and Mitt Romney are trying to "out-conservative" each other. These candidates' original principles were of a moderate American — conservative on some issues, moderate on others and even liberal on a few — but this has hurt their chances of winning the Republican presidential nomination.

These men care more about being president than they do about what they believe. The Republican Party has backed itself into a corner with issues like gay marriage, abortion and countless others.

They won a lot of elections and votes using these issues, but now that's all the conservative voting bloc wants to discuss. McCain, Giuliani and Romney all have been "pro-choice" at some point, so conservative voters are hesitant about supporting them.

Sometimes people have to make sacrifices to see the changes they want to happen. If these men ran in the primary as moderates, think about how many more young voters would be attracted to them; most people like the idea of states' rights, small government and low taxes. But because they want to be president, they are willing to allow the Republican Party to fade into oblivion and become the party of extremist evangelicals and no one else.

If the candidates stood their ground, one of them could be a 21st century Barry Goldwater. In 1964, President Lyndon Johnson whipped Sen. Goldwater in the presidential election.

Goldwater was strict in his belief that the states should have the final say in the laws that govern them. He believed it is not the job of government to be a nanny for the citizens of the United States.

This hurt him in the election, because he voted against the Civil Rights Act of 1964, a cause Johnson championed. Goldwater said the federal government should not tell states how to treat their citizens, and he alienated many people because of it.

According to the National Archives, Goldwater only won six states in the election — five in the South and his home state of Arizona — but his overwhelming defeat led many Americans — young and old — to give more thought to his libertarian ideas. This fueled the Reagan revolution 16 years later, and it all was because Goldwater stuck to his principles.

If the candidates were to stick to their beliefs, all of them would probably lose the primary. The party probably would nominate a right-wing candidate, and he most likely would lose to any of the Democratic candidates. But this could cause the Republicans to move toward the center and back to the core Republican beliefs of liberty, states' rights and national defense.

Romney's father, George, lost in the 1964 primary, and McCain's predecessor lost in the general election. But their defeats laid the foundation of the revival of the Republican Party. McCain, Giuliani and Romney need to follow in the shoes of the '64 crowd. If they want to save their party, they must be stubborn and let the party learn its lesson and lose the battle to win the war.

Citizens should take specific action to improve media's diversity coverage

"We can be heard," the students chanted in Bosco Student Plaza while other students stared with blank looks on their faces. It seemed like their ears needed to hear the message, too.

The Black Student Union illustrated this point at the "X'ed Out of Society" event, a collaborative response to hate crimes, racial injustice and discrimination in the United States — and more importantly — how it's all overlooked in society.

ANNETTE LAWLESS

Strutting around the Union with a white "X" across their black shirts, students representing a montage of ethnic backgrounds shared their concerns about racial injustice and how the media overlooked it. About 100 students participated in the silent protest, media panel and other events that day.

I spoke with several students about the event and what it meant to them. Even those who organized "X'ed Out" said at times they catch themselves overlooking racist acts in society — not because they turn their heads the other way, but because they too didn't get the message.

The message is clear: the media are to blame for the poor diversity coverage. But it's hard to be fully aware of things when you have lazy journalists who wear blinders every day. Look at the newspapers filling the racks in the Union or TV stations you watch at night.

Where were they when the racially charged Jena Six case emerged, only to start widespread media coverage four months later?

Why wasn't more attention given to the four black New Jersey college students shot execution-style, especially in comparison to incidents like Virginia Tech or Columbine, where media was immediately on the scene?

Four years ago, I hated the K-State Collegian. Much like national newspapers, the Collegian struggled with diversity. At the time, the newspaper hopped into the limelight of collegiate news for not covering an important event for black students on campus. Rumors of racism emerged, protests followed, people were fired, and the Collegian became a joke in the college-media circuit.

At the same time, I, along with other minority student leaders, decided to voice our concerns about the serious lack of judgment our student newspaper had — and still faces today. Since then, people have forgotten the news that once shook our campus so strongly.

Journalists are the eyes and ears of the world. We tell you what to wear, what's in style, which candidate to vote for, who's sleeping with whom and which team will win the big game. We shape your beliefs and your lifestyle, one minimum-wage paycheck at a time. And if journalists don't focus on issues that truly matter, including diversity, who will?

Back in 2004, I became a catalyst for change, as I believed the media needed to become better with their diversity coverage. I became a Collegian reporter in fall 2004. Later, I would become a section editor and eventually editor-in-chief — for two summers. I did it all for a newspaper that I once only picked up to read the daily Forum.

I will admit at times it's hard to be balanced and take off our blinders. With a staff of 80 people each semester, our editorial board attempts to cover a range of topics on campus — topics this predominantly white group finds important. Rarely, if ever, did we focus on diversity.

While I don't expect everyone to jump on our journalism bandwagon, they can contribute to our student newspaper in a number of ways. Write a letter to the editor or send us an e-mail about important events or people on campus. Feel free to join our staff and restore the newspaper to its once-reputable state.

When it comes to frustration with the media, don't sit back. Take a stand like the Black Student Union and others. No group should be "X'ed Out of Society." But "X" certainly can mark your spot in something we all should treasure — pertinent stories of society and the community around us.

Middle-school girls focus on math, science at weekend workshop

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Emily Ferlemann said she is unsure about what she wants to study in college, but she knows she wants to study science.

Ferlemann, an eighth-grade student at French Middle School in Topeka, said topics like microorganisms and marine biology interest her the most. She plans to take more science classes in high school and study the subject further.

About 85 sixth-, seventh- and eighth-grade girls attended "Engineering and Scientists to the Rescue" on Saturday. K-State's GROW - Girls Researching Our World - program sponsored the workshop.

The workshop featured eight hands-on sessions across K-State's campus. Ferlemann and her rescue group started the day at "What's For Lunch?" in Ackert Hall. The session educated girls about food-borne pathogens, their contaminants and how scientists use a flow-chart method to determine illness' causes.

The flow-chart method includes collecting surveys from those who got ill after eating particular foods, contacting the restaurant or food company that supplied the meals and examining the organisms under a microscope.

"I didn't realize how many steps you had to go through to find out what one little virus could do to make someone ill," Ferlemann said.

GROW started featuring workshops for middle-school girls about two years ago, and five Saturday events take place each year, said Susan Arnold Christian, outreach program coordinator for K-State's Women in Engineering and Science program.

"All of our events that we do on Saturdays are designed to show girls how scientists and engineers help make peoples' lives easier," she said. "I think one of the reasons that girls are not choosing science and engineering is because they don't see how they help people and their everyday life applications."

GROW is a network of K-State faculty, staff and students who work with school districts, colleges, universities and other organizations to ensure girls receive support while pursuing interests in science, mathematics, engineering and technology, according to K-State's GROW Web site.

GROW had its first summer workshop for middle-school girls in June 2000. K-State faculty and staff recently started tracking the girls who attended the first workshop.

Thirty-eight percent of the 100 girls who attended the workshop were reached through telephone or mail, Arnold Christian said. Forty-five percent of those contacted now are enrolled in a science, engineering or math field at K-State or another university, she said.

Events like Saturday's also help make the transition into college easier for middle- and high-school girls, Arnold Christian said.

"The girls who come to see every event really take ownership and feel like a part of the K-State family," she said.

Laura Torres, fifth-year student in electrical engineering, is a lead mentor with GROW and EXCITE!, an all-year program that offers high-school girls opportunities in science, technology engineering and mathematics.

Torres, who got involved with the programs during her first summer at K-State, said she enjoys serving as a mentor for younger students. The workshops like Saturday's help interest and excite girls about engineering and science, she said.

"It gets the girls who live in small towns to see there are other girls who are really excited about science," Torres said.

Within the last year, Torres said K-State has seen retention among girls

Massage might have led to KCK killing

The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Kan. - A massage might have led to the killing of a popular community college professor, sources said.

Richard Urdiales, 53, was found beaten to death on Sunday outside a house on North 55th Street.

Urdiales was an English professor at Blue River Metropolitan Community College in Independence, Mo., but he also made extra money as a masseur.

Students told KCTV5's Liana Joyce that Urdiales had a unique teaching style they could relate to.

"He was really loud sometimes. And I liked it, because I'm really loud, too," said Lindsay Walker, a student at the school. She added, "He was one of my favorite teachers."

"It shocked me because I didn't feel that anybody could be mad at the guy," said BRM-CC student Cory Bolin. "It just seems sad because he had a second job and somebody had the wrong impression that this had to happen."

Urdiales was giving a woman a massage inside the house when the woman's boyfriend showed up and attacked him, sources said.

Prosecutors charged the woman's boyfriend - Daniel C. Hoyle, 21 - with first-degree murder.

On Wednesday, Hoyle was being held in the Wyandotte County Jail on a $500,000 bond.

FOOTBALL | OKLAHOMA STATE 41, NO. 25 K-STATE 39

TURNING POINT

Dantrell Savage's 24-yard reception
Savage made just one catch, but it was a big one. The 24-yard reception on Oklahoma State's final drive put the Cowboys in field-goal range, setting up Jason Ricks' 26-yard chip shot with 2 seconds remaining.

QUOTE OF THE GAME

Ron Prince | On his decision to go for two: "I know that's an unconventional decision. I realize that's the kind of decision that could be criticized. I didn't really care. I was going to get the ball to our best player and play to win."

MAGIC NUMBER

1,039 | That's the combined total offense in this 41-39 shootout — 529 yards for K-State and 510 for the Cowboys. Quarterback Josh Freeman threw for a career-high 404 yards, while the Cowboys gashed K-State for 329 yards on the ground.

MVP

Josh Freeman | The sophomore quarterback completed 31-of-56 throws, including a crucial two-point conversion toss that gave K-State the lead, albeit a brief one.

Know the Cats' future is bright

It was a hard-fought game won by Oklahoma State on a last-second field goal. Once it was over, the K-State nation heaved a collective sigh and started pointing fingers.

But Oklahoma State deserved to win. The Cowboys earned it with a 329-yard rushing performance.

K-State fans are disappointed, and they have every right to be. But they also should realize this K-State team is significantly better than it was a year ago.

K-State would have lost this game by 20 points last year. I think everyone remembers the embarrassing loss to Baylor last season.

Even after a tough loss, this year's team sticks together. Junior Deon Murphy said the loss made him — and the rest of the team — even more focused. Anyone could see it in his eyes. He seemed focused and ready for Baylor.

The Wildcats gained 529 yards of offense and topped 30 points for the fifth time this season, something that gets lost in all the complaining and finger-pointing. It might surprise a few fans to learn that K-State is ranked 16th in the nation in scoring offense this season with 37 points per game.

Then there is sophomore quarterback Josh Freeman. He looked like a pro on Saturday, throwing for 404 yards and three touchdowns. For the first time, he has more touchdowns (8) than interceptions (7) in a season. He is growing up quickly. Plus, he has senior Jordy Nelson to throw the ball to.

Nelson has 68 catches on the year for 903 yards. Nothing else needs to be said on how special he is.

Yes, the defense looks terrible. They have been gouged the last three games by the run game, but look at the upcoming schedule. The next three opponents have problems. Two don't run very well, and Nebraska is imploding.

Baylor is averaging a little bit more than 72 yards per game on the ground and only had eight rushing yards in its loss to Texas last week.

Iowa State is averaging 124.75 rushing yards per game, but that has slipped to 105.5 during Big 12 play. The Cyclones put up a fight against Oklahoma this weekend, but they aren't talented enough to play that way every week.

Nebraska has lost the last three games by a combined score of 122-32. The Huskers fired their athletic director last week, and things don't look good for coach Bill Calahan. His team seems lifeless, and the Cornhuskers might be dead when the Wildcats get to Lincoln, Neb., in three weeks.

So if K-State takes care of business in these three games, the Wildcats will be 7-3 and bowl-eligible going into the final two games of the regular season.

All these things make the rest of the season look really bright for the Wildcats and their fans. So stop focusing on the negatives and consider how good the future looks.

Josh Freeman threw for a career high 404 yards including three touchdowns and a late two-point conversion pass to Jordy Nelson with 1:10 left in the fourth quarter. Freeman also completed 36 of 51 attempts through the air.

Jason Ricks nailed a 26-yard field goal with two seconds remaining to secure the win for the Cowboys. The field goal came after K-State scored, a two-point conversion to take a one-point lead with just more than a minute left in the game.

Not enough

Gutsy 2-point call moot after field goal

By Jeffrey Rake

STILLWATER, Okla. — K-State did nearly everything it had to do on its final drive.

The Wildcats moved down the field, found the end zone, and instead of going for the tie, they played for the win.

Their fatal flaw? They scored too quickly.

Trailing by one point after Leon Patton's 11-yard TD run, K-State successfully completed a two-point conversion by putting the ball in the hands of its playmaker — Jordy Nelson.

But there was still 1 minute, 10 seconds left. And in this game, which had 1,039 total yards of offense, that was simply too much time.

Oklahoma State drove down the field, Jason Ricks kicked a 26-yard field goal with two seconds left, and the Cowboys defeated K-State 41-39 Saturday night in front of 41,725 at Boone Pickens Stadium.

"I anticipated this being a really terrific game," coach Ron Prince said. "We came to their place, and we gave it a good fight. It wasn't enough."

It certainly could have been.

Despite three turnovers, a special-teams unit that allowed a kick return for a touchdown and a defense that couldn't stop much of anything, the Wildcats still had a chance at the end.

But they couldn't find a way to slow down the Cowboys, who marched 49 yards on six plays to set up the game-winning score.

"We missed tackles, and that's a problem we've been having," safety Chris Carney said. "Give all the credit to Oklahoma State because they went down and did what they needed to do and scored."

Oklahoma State (5-3, 3-1 Big 12 Conference) racked up 329 rushing yards on 59 carries, led by Dantrell Savage, who had 28 attempts for 124 yards. Quarterback Zac Robinson threw for 181 yards and three touchdowns and added 109 yards on the ground.

"I tried to compare this team, offensively, to the 2002 St. Louis Rams — 'The Greatest Show on Turf,'" Prince said. "They've been able to win in a shootout against Texas Tech and against ourselves here. My hat is off to them."

K-State's offense was just as impressive. Nelson had 12 catches for 176 yards and became the first player since James Terry in 2003 to have three receiving touchdowns in a game.

Quarterback Josh Freeman, meanwhile, had a career performance. He went 36-of-51 for 404 yards and three TDs. He wasn't impressed.

"It wasn't good enough to win," Freeman said. "I'd take last week's game over this week's game any day."

Fumbles put damper a good day for Wildcat offense

STILLWATER, Okla. — Head coach Ron Prince compared Oklahoma State's offense to that of the 2002 St. Louis Rams, nicknamed "The Greatest Show on Turf."

However, that nickname could apply to Prince's offense as well.

The Cowboys could not stop sophomore Josh Freeman and Co. all night. K-State racked up 529 yards of total offense, with 404 in the air. Senior wide receiver Jordy Nelson was dominant again. Then why in the world did K-State lose?

Despite the impressive numbers, K-State's offense fumbled away two scoring opportunities.

The first fumble occurred in the second quarter when K-State had a first down on Oklahoma State's 34-yard line. Freeman had completed a six-yard pass to senior tight-end Michael Pooschke when a Cowboy defender hit the ball and jarred it loose. Oklahoma State junior Quinton Moore recovered the fumble at the 30-yard line.

The second happened deeper in Cowboy territory. Another tight end, sophomore Jeron Mastrud, fumbled at the OSU 8-yard line after he caught a Freeman pass late in the third quarter.

"Whenever you have turnovers, especially on fumbles like that, it is not good," Nelson said. "I'm sure we will be working on that. We've just got to be ball secure."

Those two fumbles were the only negative for an offense that was clicking all night.

Freeman had a career high in passing yards and did not commit a turnover. It was his fourth game of the year without a turnover and his first three-touchdown performance.

"Based on the way that they played the defense coming into the game, I told him he would have that kind of game," Prince said. "I talked to him at the hotel today and told him he could end up having a career high, but it wouldn't be because of the career high that we would win."

Freeman's game wasn't good enough to please the sophomore quarterback, mainly because it wasn't a win for the Wildcats.

"Average," Freeman said. "It wasn't good enough to win. I'd take last week's game over this week's game any day."

The passing game wasn't the only thing rolling for the Wildcats. The ground game put up some nice yards as well.

Senior James Johnson and sophomore Leon Patton combined for 118 yards on 18 carries and two touchdowns. The Wildcats had 125 yards rushing, most of them in the second half.

Still, it is almost becoming cliché. Nelson stole the show. He had 12 catches for 176 yards and three touchdowns. Those touchdowns doubled his total of receiving touchdowns for the year and also helped bring his total number of catches to 68 for 903 yards.

"Jordy's always good," Freeman said. "He comes to play, comes to practice every day. I mean, this is just a normal Jordy Nelson performance."

VOLLEYBALL

Lastra's 29 digs not enough to top OU

STAFF REPORTS

Senior Angie Lastra recorded a season-high 29 digs, but it just wasn't enough for the K-State volleyball team.

The 14th-ranked Wildcats lost to No. 23 Oklahoma 3-1 (27-30, 25-30, 30-26, 28-30) Friday at the McCasland House in Norman, Okla.

Lastra topped 20 digs for the seventh time this season, while junior outside hitter Nataly Korobkova recorded her sixth double-double. Korobkova led the Wildcats in kills with 21 and also finished with 12 digs. Junior Rita Liliom and freshman outside hitter JuliAnne Chisholm both chalked up 10 kills.

Chisholm's 10-kill performance against the Sooners was a career-high for the Hillsboro, Kan., native. Her feat came one match after her previous career-high of eight kills against Texas Tech. Against Oklahoma, Chisholm also added four digs and one solo block.

Middle blocker Kelsey Chipman led the Wildcats' defensive front, tallying two solo blocks and five block assists. K-State finished with 15 team blocks.

Oklahoma edged the Wildcats defensively, however, amassing a season-high 90 digs as a team.

Four Sooners recorded double-digit digs, including Mariana Blum (29), Bridget Laplante (26), Hannah Sharp (12) and Julie Chester (12). Both Blum and Laplante recorded a career-high in digs.

Oklahoma's offensive attack was equally impressive, as five players broke into double-digit kills.

The Wildcats won the hitting-percentage and kill battle though, finishing with 65 kills on .166 hitting. The Sooners hit .151 and totaled 60 kills.

K-State continued its aggressive service style, totaling five service aces. The Wildcats continued their streak of matches with at least one service ace. The last time K-State did not record a service ace was against Colorado on Nov. 7, 1998. Despite the Wildcats' serving history, 13 errors plagued their service against Oklahoma.

The Sooners' (16-5, 8-3) victory moves them into sole possession of third place in the Big 12 Conference, while K-State drops to fourth place and is now 15-6 overall and 7-4 in conference play.

Putting the green back in Greensburg

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA, Kan. — A tornado leveled Jerrold Hoffman's town of Udall more than 50 years ago, killing 77 people and leaving little behind. After a twister swept through Greensburg this year, wreaking similar destruction, he decided he would try to help the town get its scenery back.

Next Saturday, he and a group of volunteers plan to begin overseeing tree planting to help return a sense of normalcy to residents after the May 4 tornado, which killed 10 people, destroyed some 2,000 trees and nearly wiped the town of 1,400 off the map.

About 40 homeowners have signed up to have a tree planted. The money for the project has come from donors nationwide, including many with ties to Greensburg or Udall, Hoffman said.

One donor wrote that her mother lost her home in the Udall tornado of May 25, 1955, he said.

"When she spoke of the tornado, she always said she was sad because she lost so many of her friends and her trees," the letter writer said. "When anyone would ask her what they could do to help after the storm she always said, 'Plant a tree.'"

Hoffman took his idea to the Udall Community Historical Society, which agreed to sponsor the fundraising. He said he is about $2,000 short of his $10,000 goal to buy trees but decided to move ahead.

Hoffman said he is planning more tree-planting trips.

"I thought it was going to be an overnight job. But it's going to be an ongoing job," he said. "I think by next fall we should be pretty close to finishing."

Helping Hoffman plant trees will be the Westar Energy Green Team, volunteers who are employees and retirees of Westar Energy Inc.

The trees are 10 to 12 feet tall and include oaks, elms and cottonwoods.

Plans call for one tree for each homeowner wanting one, but Hoffman said there will be extra trees for those wanting another. The trees will be given to homeowners with functioning utilities, so they can water them.

Loveless said he and other volunteers will show residents how to plant and care for the young trees.

Former multicultural engineering director addresses students

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Karen M. Martin said she had no idea what engineering entailed until she came to K-State as the Multicultural Engineering Program director.

The director position provided her with the opportunity to mentor students and expose them to different engineering career fields, said Martin, now the vice president for Student Affairs at Grambling State University in Grambling, La.

"I'm crazy about what I do," said Martin, who served as MEP director from 1993-96. "I have a passion about what I do, and I think while I was here at K-State, that passion was passed on to the students, because many of them graduated and are now in corporate America."

Martin presented the keynote address at K-State's MEP 30th anniversary celebration banquet Saturday night at the Holiday Inn at the Campus. The two-day conference, "K-State Engineering Leads to Unique and Wonderful Places," featured workshops and panel discussions with faculty members, alumni and current students.

Career fields like engineering provide students with many networking opportunities, Martin said. She also said students should ask for professionals' business cards and follow up with e-mails and phone calls.

"You will become what they currently are," Martin said. "It's amazing — when you align yourself with people that you admire, you eventually mold and shape your own destiny and become like that person."

K-State's MEP is a program designed to help recruit, retain, educate and graduate quality multicultural students with an aptitude for math and science. MEP provides students with services like academic advising, scholarships, tutoring, math and science workshops, and job-placement assistance.

Martin said there are three steps for students to experience success — conceive, believe and achieve.

Students must conceive and have an idea of what they want to become in five years, she said.

Believing in oneself is the second step, Martin said. Belief requires making sacrifices and studying, attending classes and passing exams, she said.

Achievement — the final step toward success — comes on graduation day for students when they receive their diploma, Martin said. Students owe it to themselves to earn their diploma and not quit school, she said.

Martin, a certified and licensed audiologist, said it took her about five years to earn her doctorate at K-State. After four attempts at applications for graduation, Martin said she refused to give up.

"Don't leave here owing $45,000 worth of student loans (without) that paper in your hand," she said.

Martin ended her speech with encouragement for students to do their best, regardless of academic year or major.

"Do your best," she said. "Don't be mediocre in what you are accomplishing in your classrooms today. Do your very best, because I promise you what little effort you put in today will have great impact on your future, which is tomorrow."

A mother parma wallaby and her joey are residing in the Australia exhibit at Sunset Zoological Park. The joey is still in its mother's pouch, and is difficult to see because it does not peek its head out often.

Anteater, wallaby both give birth at Sunset Zoological Park

By Emily Aldredge
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A giant anteater infant and a parma wallaby infant recently were born at Sunset Zoological Park. Both animals are being raised by their birth mothers and are doing well, zoo employees said.

Sunset Zoo General Curator Mark Ryan said signs of the newborn wallaby, called a joey, were first visible about a month ago when the mother — Too-woomba — began to look larger near her pouch.

"He is getting big enough now where you can see her stomach is slightly stretched," Ryan said. "Sometimes you can see a head or tail pop out."

The giant anteater baby will not be visible to the public for a few more months. Ryan said they want the mother — Angelica — and her infant to spend time together alone and undisturbed. The pair also will enjoy the comforts of their indoor facility when the winter weather gets cold.

Zoo patrons can visit Too-woomba and her joey in the Australian exhibit, and when Angelica and her infant are ready for visitors, they will be in the South American exhibit, Ryan said. Neither of the newborns has been named yet, as the staff is waiting for them to get settled.

Ryan said the mothers of both newborns are doing such a great job that little work is required from the zoo staff.

"We just make sure all the diets are adequate," he said. "If (the mother) is not looking stressed, we can just watch."

One of the reasons Ryan said he thinks the mothers are doing so well raising the newborn animals is that these are not the first babies for either. Too-woomba has raised many joeys successfully, and Angelica has given birth before but was unsuccessful raising the baby.

Ryan said she is doing a much better job on her second try. Too-woomba's baby was a slight surprise to the zoo staff, Ryan said.

"We weren't planning on it," Ryan said. "We were actually testing new methods of birth control."

Angelica's infant was more expected. Staff members noticed breeding behavior last April, and giant anteaters have a six-month gestation period, so they were able to guess approximately when the anteater would be born.

The zoo staff is getting ready to switch to its winter schedule. Beginning November 1, the zoo will be open from noon until 5 p.m. Depending on the weather, hundreds of visitors will visit Sunset Zoo each weekend.

Last Saturday, Manhattan resident Selia Pierce was one of more than 400 people who visited the zoo.

She said she and her children usually make a trip to the zoo once a month if the weather is nice.

Pierce said her children have a new favorite animal on each trip.

"They had a lot of fun with the goats today," she said.

Riley County raises $2M to build $3.9M hospice home in Manhattan

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan branch of a nonprofit organization called Homecare and Hospice is building a hospice home for people diagnosed with terminal illnesses who would like to die in the quietness and comfort of a home environment.

Riley County never has had such a facility, so officials at Homecare and Hospice decided it was time to build one.

Chris Nolte, director of development for Homecare and Hospice, said Riley County needs a hospice house so terminally ill people can get the professional medical care they need while spending their last days in a home-like environment.

The closest hospice homes to Manhattan are in Salina and Topeka, which are too far for families to visit their loved ones, he said.

"Patients feel comfortable knowing they have professional staff and that their needs and their families' needs are completely met," Nolte said.

The hospice house will be 15,000 square feet in size and offer common areas for patients' families (like a dining room, kitchen, living room and family room).

The 12 patient rooms are designed to look like bedrooms, some of which have small living rooms for visitors, Nolte said.

Hospice services are free for those covered by Medicare and certain insurance policies, Nolte said.

However, patients and their families must pay room and board at hospice homes.

Riley County offers hospice care to patients in their own homes and nursing homes, but there are restraints to such a system, Nolte said.

Manhattan's hospice house will admit anyone, regardless of age, who has been diagnosed with a terminal illness and is unable to stay at home.

"They get the very best of support in care in those last days," said Rita Keating, co-chair of the campaign to build the house. "It's something I've been passionate about for a long time."

Keating said the hospice house will fill a void in Manhattan health care. She and her husband donated $500,000 to the Homecare and Hospice campaign to build the hospice home, which is trying to raise $3.9 million altogether, Nolte said.

The campaign has surpassed the $2 million mark, thanks to many donations from Manhattan residents and people from the surrounding area, plus a recent Mabee Foundation Challenge Grant of $550,000. Nolte said construction will begin in fall 2008, and the house is scheduled to open in fall 2009.

"It's so humbling to see the generosity in the Manhattan community and people who aren't even in our area," Keating said. "It takes lots of people, and we've just had an amazing response."

Dean Thibault, campaign co-chair, said he thinks most people contribute to create a comfortable place for family and friends to go if they ever are diagnosed with a terminal illness.

He said his father spent his last month dying of cancer in a hospital, which Thibault said was an uncomfortable place for his father and for his mother, who wanted to stay at her husband's side.

Hospitals focus on curing, Thibault said, while hospice houses offer comfort and medical attention in a home-like environment for people who are dying.

"It makes all the difference in the world," Thibault said. "This completes that quality of care through the end of life, literally."

The Polyphonic Spree, a choral symphonic rock group of 24 members, consists of a choir, string and brass instruments. The band members generally wear robes to distinguish themselves from the audience.

Polyphonic Spree offers high energy, great show in Lawrence

The Polyphonic Spree

Concert review by Eric Davis

The Polyphonic Spree is one of the happiest bands of all time, and they proved that Saturday night in Lawrence. The Spree, which has 24 members, visited Lawrence and brought California rock-band Rooney and the Chicago-based band the Redwalls with them.

I was walking around before the show looking at the merchandise table, and I asked the guy running the table about the Redwalls, a band I had never heard of before.

"They sound a lot like the Beatles," the table operator said.

I laughed — every band tries to sound like the Beatles. But when they got on-stage, they looked like the Beatles more than they sounded like them, as they were much too heavy for the lads from Liverpool.

It was clear that the Beatles heavily influenced them, but they did a good job of adapting certain Beatles elements. The result was an original sound that fit well with the mood of the evening's show.

The second band was Rooney, and the band members played a strong mix of songs from their old record and also some of the classics from previous albums.

Starting the night off with "Shakin'" Rooney got the crowd up and going early in the evening. It was clear that while many in the crowd were on hand to see the Spree, many came to see Rooney as well.

Rooney's lack of theatrics made the show unexciting. The music was solid and tight, but there were no real memorable moments from the set.

Overall, the band played a good show that the fans seemed to enjoy. They shouldn't be missed next time they are in the area.

The main act, the Polyphonic Spree, did a great job of putting on a show, but the band did not forget the reason it was there — to play music.

After Rooney finished its set, a long, red sheet was hung on the front of the stage so concertgoers couldn't see what was happening on stage. Only shadows were visible on the sheet, and this heightened the curiosity as all 24 members of the band came to the stage.

During the band's mysterious entrance, a harpist played an extended introduction for "Running Away," the first song of the set.

Tim Delaughter, the lead singer and frontman for the group, began cutting a heart out of the sheet when he got on stage. After poking his head through the heart-shaped hole, Delaughter cut the sheet in half, officially starting the song.

About halfway into the song, white confetti fell from the ceiling as a strobe light started flashing. The result was surreal. The effects combined to make the climax of the song even better.

The Polyphonic Spree was one of three bands to perform at The Grenada in Lawrence. Rooney and the Redwalls opened for the Spree Saturday night.

After the confetti, the band continued its ultra high-energy entertainment until the end of the show and even carried it into the encore. The band played "Together We're Heavy," an instrumental song that allowed other singers to walk around in the crowd, slapping hands with the attendees.

Overall, the Polyphonic Spree struck a great balance between playing its songs and entertaining the crowd. They did not allow the presentation to get in the way of the music, and the result was amazing. The Polyphonic Spree's songs are high energy and contain positive messages that all blend perfectly to create one of the most distinct and exciting stage shows on tour today.

Bluemont Buffet offers different atmosphere, inexpensive meal in Union

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tucked away on the second floor of the K-State Student Union is a restaurant unlike the other food chains found in the building.

It is a formal restaurant where the dress code is often different than that of the food court.

Faculty members and administrators looking for a quiet place to eat lunch frequently visit the restaurant, called Bluemont Buffet.

While the main clients are not students, some do visit the restaurant.

"I have been there for a meeting with a professor who was buying me dinner," said Paul Mintner, junior in political science.

Despite the fact that mostly faculty and staff dine in the restaurant, many students eat there on occasion for a decent lunch out of the ordinary for the typical college student.

"I go there sometimes when I want a change of pace," Natalie Cloud, sophomore in dietetics, said. "The food is pretty good and is reasonably priced."

The buffet costs $7.49, with an array of entrées, carved meats, vegetables, hot rolls, desserts, beverages and a salad bar available. The restaurant is open from 11 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. Monday through Friday and encourages reservations, said Tina Griffin, food services director.

"It is usually faculty and staff that go there," Griffin said. "However, we have seen more students this year and would like to see more students come. It is really a great value."

Though the restaurant offers a good meal for a decent price, many students lead lives too hectic to actually sit down and eat lunch.

"The only problem is that in the middle of the day it is hard to find time to sit down and eat," Mintner said. "It is not like Panda (Express) where I can grab something quick and just go."

The atmosphere of the Bluemont Buffet offers something different than the loud and busy food court down below.

"It is a lot quieter," Mintner said. "I definitely feel like I should dress nicer when I go there."

Albus Dumbledore, former Hogwarts headmaster, outed as gay

J.K. Rowling made a shocking announcement Friday at Carnegie Hall while promoting her seventh book of the Harry Potter series.

While Rowling was answering questions about the characters, she was asked if Dumbledore ever found "true love." Rowling announced that Harry's mentor is homosexual.

Rowling said Dumbledore's true love was in fact Gellert Grindelwald — the dark wizard who Dumbledore defeated in the early days of his career — and the "horribly, terribly let down" love for Grindelwald that Dumbledore had was a "great tragedy" that he suffered in his earlier days, which he carried with him for the rest of his life.

The news came after Rowling read the script for the sixth movie that carried a reference of one of Dumbledore's old female love interests.

a classical music concert from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. The musicians were the first to perform on the museum's newly acquired 1914 Steinway piano, Scott said.

"The Kansas Music Teachers Association's performance was terrific," Walker Schlageck said. "Their classical style sounded wonderful on our new piano. They were a great performance group to first play on our new piano."

The afternoon focused its attraction and entertainment toward families and children, Scott said. From 2 to 4 p.m., Up, Up and Away Balloon Artists and Rex Getz, a local magician, strolled around to guests to construct balloon animals or perform magic tricks for them. Face painters also colorfully painted children's cheeks.

Also from 2 to 4 p.m., guests were supplied with feathers, sequins, jewels and stickers to decorate party hats. The museum's attendees were given the opportunity to create art with sidewalk chalk on the museum's back ramp, and the coordinators hoped that by the end of the day, the whole ramp would be decorated with colorful creations, Walker Schlageck said.

Lorne Render, Beach Museum director, said he based his judgment of the day's success on the positive feedback from the families and children.

"I am thrilled to have families back in the museum," Render said. "It's so nice to hear kids and see their energy level while they look at art and experience fun."

The evening was designed to attract K-State students, Scott said. From 4 to 6 p.m., KACZ-FM 96.3 did a radio remote, and from 5 to 7 p.m., the coordinators provided a pre-homecoming tailgate with free hamburgers and hot dogs for K-State students. A pep band from the K-State Marching Band also made a 15-minute appearance to perform Wildcat favorites.

Museum coordinators also planned to actively engage the attendees in the museum's showcased artwork through a scavenger hunt, Scott said. The letters featured in the new "Art's Up!" advertisement logo are illustrated with and composed of different artworks displayed in the museum, she said. If the scavenger-hunt participants found the different artworks in the museum that comprise the letters in the logo, they received a Beach Museum cup. The coordinators plan to continue the interactive activity for the rest of the year.

"I hope that our reopening day will give K-State students a sense that the Beach Museum is a place to visit and talk," Render said.

"I want them to have fun. The museum is not a quiet, meditative, stodgy place. I want them to know that this is the place for them to explore and think."

the character she would be portraying prior to the day of the exhibit made her nervous.

"I didn't know if I could display the emotion," DePaola said, "but once I saw the painting, I liked it and felt more comfortable."

DePaola was dressed in a melon-colored silk dress, sitting quietly at a small wooden table as she mimicked a native girl in a similar position. She said she hoped this experience would broaden her abilities and help in her future acting career.

"It's a different type of acting," she said. "It helps you see more depth to the actual painting."

Linda Uthoff, MHS drama director, said she thought Sunday's museum reopening was a great opportunity for her students to enhance the art for themselves and museum visitors.

"I think it will help the students to make a connection between art and theater," Uthoff said. "I also hope it reminds visitors that the person in the painting, in (Pennell's) case, was a real person."

Manhattan resident Sue Hunt said she thought it was a good opportunity for the Thespians to expand their experiences, but the Beach museum should have publicized more that the students would be there.

"It might be a little intimidating for some people to go up to the art and look if they didn't know what (the Thespians) were doing," Hunt said. "But it is an interesting touch."

The idea to have real-life imitators of the art during the grand reopening came from Kathrine Walker Schlageck, museum senior-education coordinator.

"I've worked in a lot of museums before where they brought the art to life with actors, and I thought it would be fun to try here," Walker Schlageck said. "We've been eager to include the MHS students, and this was a great nontraditional way to do so. We really wanted to make this a community event."

Walker Schlageck also said the museum staff hoped the Thespians would engage younger museum attendees.

"We think it will get kids' attention," she said. "I definitely think our visitors will enjoy this, and I see it happening again in the future."

leads in the first half, both a result of Nelson TD catches. His first grab, a 17-yard catch and run, put K-State ahead 14-0. After the Cowboys pulled within seven, Freeman again found Nelson, this time for a 46-yard touchdown.

The Wildcats, who led 21-17 at the half, fell behind 31-28 before Brooks Rossman made a 23-yard field goal with 8:01 left.

But the Cowboys responded with a 10-play, 83-yard drive that ended in a 39-yard TD pass from Robinson to Brandon Pettigrew.

"We used a variety of coverages to get our matchups the way we wanted them," Prince said. "(Robinson) was just able to pick them apart."

K-State scored on the ensuing possession, but before Patton reached the end zone, Prince already had decided what he would do. He was going for two.

"I realize that's the kind of decision that could be criticized," Prince said. "I didn't really care. I was going to get the ball to our best player and play to win."

The move paid off. Freeman found Nelson for the conversion, and the Wildcats took the lead.

It just wasn't enough.

Jeron Mastrud fumbles on Oklahoma State's 6-yard line with 3:36 left in the third quarter while the Wildcat's had a 28-24 lead.

KANSAS STANDS UP AGAINST COAL POLLUTION

SPARE THE AIR, PROTECT PUBLIC HEALTH

Steve Simpson, MD

Associate Professor

University of Kansas
Medical Center

The additional 1400-megawatt, coal-fired units proposed for Holcomb would emit ten million more tons of carbon dioxide annually and take a serious additional toll on public health. The irony is, Kansans don't need that much extra electricity. Almost all (85%) of the power generated would be sold out of state. We'd just keep 100% of the pollution.

The perception has been that "coal is cheaper" for generating electricity. But Kansas is realizing that fuel cost is a fraction of the expense they will bear if this $3.5 billion expansion were built. Coal plant construction overruns and costly future carbon taxes have led to the rejection or withdrawal of 22 proposed coal power plants in 16 states since last year. Kansas should be the 17th state.

Of course, "cheaper" also doesn't cover the harm coal emissions do to public health and consequent medical costs - and that harm begins before birth, given the effect of pollution on pregnant women as well as children, the elderly and many adults.

Coal pollutants that affect health and life expectancy (and require costly medical care) include carbon dioxide, mercury and hazardous fine particles.

Diseases: Children exposed to coal plant emissions are at higher risk for a host of respiratory problems, including allergies, asthma and other respiratory diseases - even affecting lung development. Emissions also cause heart disease, stroke, cancer, early deaths and lifetimes of compromised health for thousands of Kansans. This is no bargain.

Our state's medical community is joining forces with other Kansans who are committed to rejection of the proposed Holcomb power plant. We can't afford the high price of pumping more coal pollution into Kansas skies. The time to stand up is now.

Q & A WITH STUDENT AMBASSADORS

Lyndsey Born | COLLEGIAN

Ambassadors discuss experiences, challenges

The 2006-07 Student Ambassadors' terms are coming to an end. Andrew Ellis, senior in political science, and Katelyn Schmidt, senior in public relations, reflect upon the past year and share what they have learned. They also give advice to the new ambassadors who will be announced during halftime at the homecoming football game vs. Baylor on Saturday.

What were your goals going into your term as student ambassadors?

Ellis - I think for me, I just wanted to make sure that I represented K-State in a positive way and I had fun doing it. I know that the previous ambassadors established a pretty strong reputation as leaders on campus and leaders of K-State in general. I just wanted to maintain that legacy and hopefully add some of my own personal touches on to it.

Schmidt - I pretty much just wanted to be passionate about the school and convey that and just have fun and meet so many great people. I wanted to meet perspective students to basically tell them how much we loved K-State and how they would be a great fit here.

Do you feel you accomplished what you wanted to do during your term?

Ellis - Between the people we've met, the places we've gone, the overall experience, it's exceeded my expectations, and I think I've met all the goals. I've met some obviously fantastic people and really felt like I was out spreading the good word about K-State and having a good time doing it. Just flying on the plane has been an amazing experience, and meeting Bill Snyder was a childhood dream.

Schmidt - Yeah, we got to meet a lot of people. The whole experience has been fantastic and has totally gone beyond expectations, and I think I'd definitely do it again if I could. It's definitely been one of the best things I've done at K-State while I've been here. I think we've met our goals. However, I definitely know my Kansas geography a lot better.

What is the greatest lesson you will take from being a student ambassador?

Ellis - It's just how amazing and diverse the people of Kansas are and K-State fans and alumni are in general. I think people hear Kansas and they think rural, wheat fields, but it's so much more than that. Kansas is a fantastic place. It's the heartland of the nation, and the people here are very intelligent and real, and they have lots of goals. And it's been fantastic getting to know as many of them as I can. It just makes me feel really good about what the university has done for so many other people other than myself.

Schmidt - I think what I've learned is basically just the pride of the university. Being from Australia, there wasn't really a sense of pride, especially with schools and coming here, the people that we've met - young and old - that absolutely love K-State has been phenomenal. I didn't realize a university that I thought was just a school, a place of learning, could have such a sense of pride about it. That's been fantastic to learn. I love K-State even more so than I did to begin with, so that was something really exciting to learn.

Would you do anything differently if you could go back, knowing what you know now?

Ellis - As far as the public speaking aspect goes, we're definitely more comfortable. That only comes with practice, but I don't have any regrets.

Schmidt - No regrets. I wish I didn't have a fear of flying, but it was probably a little hiccup along the way, but the whole experience was amazing. I wouldn't change anything about it.

After 30 years of having student ambassadors at K-State, do you think it's an institution worth keeping?

Ellis - I definitely do. It's hard to say how great the whole experience was without tooting your own horn, but the opportunity to tell people about K-State is something you can't really put a price on or put a value on. So I totally think it's worth keeping.

Schmidt - I think it's great that actual current students do this position, it's not someone that graduated 20 years ago. Also, we're in everything, so I think that is really important that we have that voice of the university, and I think it brings a sense of reality to it.

Overall, describe your experience as student ambassadors.

Ellis - We did the Wabash Cannonball in front of the 50th reunion here at K-State, and I was worried someone was going to throw out a hip. I emceed a trustees weekend for the KSU Foundation. I mean, meeting Bill Snyder. Everything about it has been so positive, so fun. I've not had a single time where I thought, "This is terrible, I'm not having any fun." K-Staters can always connect on a personal level because they've been in Manhattan and they've lived the lifestyle. Either they've lived in Jardine or they went to the football game or they went to Aggieville a few times. Being able to connect like that with pretty much anybody we met was pretty cool.

Schmidt - I think it's a sense of family. That's the key word that we always used in our presentations - family. K-State is a family, and it's been great to meet all these people who are a part of that.

What is your advice to the next round of ambassadors?

Schmidt - Just enjoy it because it goes so quickly. I really can't believe that we are about to retire. I don't want to give it up because it has been so much fun.

Ellis - Just appreciate it for what it is. Not every student gets to leave class at 4:30, fly to Ness City, Kan., then give a presentation, come home that night, study for a test, take a test the next morning, then give another presentation to the alumni board the next day. Although, it's just not an average student experience and to be able to have it and to share it with other people, don't take that for granted. It's a great position, and it does a lot of great things for the university, so just cherish the opportunity that you've got.

Alumni Association, members of committee plan Homecoming

Jonathan Knight | COLLEGIAN

By Sydney Eagleton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Before K-State students even began to brainstorm their preparations for All-University Homecoming, the K-State Alumni Association was hard at work months before, planning and organizing.

"It's year-round planning," said Andrea Bryant Gladin, associate alumni director for the association. "As soon as Homecoming is over, we do evaluations and make preliminary changes for the next year."

Leaders for the project from within the alumni association are selected in November and December. Applications are taken for the student committee at the beginning of the spring semester, Gladin said.

Once the student committee is chosen, students put in many hours and start their own planning.

"We put in one meeting a week, and we meet outside of that when we need to do different things and throw concepts around," said Gregg Joyal, Student Homecoming Committee member and senior in park management. "This year we toured Bramlage to see how to set up for Pant the Chant."

The committee helps decide the Homecoming theme and creates new ideas, changes and locations for the year. It also works with the association on most aspects of Homecoming preparation, Joyal said.

Though the Alumni Association provides most of the funding, the Student Homecoming Committee sells Homecoming T-shirts to raise money, he said.

"The Alumni Association put about $15,000 towards Homecoming this year," said Gladin. "That is funded by the general budget, which is alumni donations and member fees. It pays for all the events, rentals of facilities, supplies, publicity for the week - basically all the logistics."

Both the association and the Student Homecoming Committee put endless hours of preparation into Homecoming for months before the big week.

"It takes dedication and attention to detail," said Alex Suñé, Student Homecoming Committee member and senior in management. "Not just dedication for your living group, but for the whole university Homecoming."

Each committee member has a different aspect of Homecoming on which they focus.

"It depends on which subcommittee or area of Homecoming you're working on," Suñé said. "A lot of it is coordinated by the committee head, and then the subcommittee helps with the little things that need to be done."

As each subcommittee takes care of its individual event, the members must have to keep in mind Homecoming as a whole.

"The subcommittee makes sure their stuff is getting done," Suñé said, "but we always report back to the group as a whole."

Working with the Alumni Association and on the Homecoming committee has been a positive experience for both Suñé and Joyal, they said.

"This is my second year," Suñé said. "I chose to be a part of it because I thought it would be cool to do something that affects the university as a whole."

Joyal, who also is serving his second year on the Homecoming committee, agrees.

"It's a great experience," he said. "It's a way that I can stay involved with campus and knowing what's going on in the events. I get to meet people that I otherwise wouldn't."

However, it does not take being a committee member to be involved in Homecoming, Suñé said.

Former student designs logo for 1st time in K-State history

By Sydney Eagleton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the first time in K-State's history, a student designed the homecoming logo. Donnie Lee, 2007 graduate in social sciences, was first contacted about drawing a design late last semester after expressing an interest in helping with the graphic-design aspects of homecoming.

"It's something I haven't done before, and it was something novel and it's something challenging," Lee said. "I've always been interested in graphic design."

In the past, the Alumni Association staff has designed the logos for homecoming, said Andrea Bryant Gladin, associate director of alumni programs at the Alumni Association.

But after Lee expressed interest, he was given the chance to come up with a design. So far there has been positive feedback toward a student designing the logo.

"I think it's great that we have student participation in that capacity," said Gladin. Students look forward to this becoming a new K-State tradition as well.

"I think it's amazing," said Gregg Joyal, senior in park management. "I think it's a tradition worth keeping. A contest would even be great if it were possible. It's great to get students involved in another way."

Being involved was a positive experience, Lee said, and he hopes it can be something others can participate in.

"I think having a student designing the logo can become a K-State tradition in itself," Lee said.

There were guidelines for Lee to follow, but that did not mean the perfect logo came to him right away.

"It was trial and error," Lee said. "I weeded out the ones I liked and disliked and when I showed it to (the Homecoming Committee), we tweaked it and came up with what we have now."

The whole process has to take place with enough time for changes, finalization and production of materials with the logo.

"It all has to happen months before," said Gladin. "We have to have the logo in April or May. Everything depends on timing."

After submitting his best ideas and working on them with the committee, Lee came up with the 2007 K-State Homecoming logo.

"He did two different versions," said Gladin. "One was with Willie and was more cartoony and then a more simplified version."

Though the simplified version is what will be seen the most for promotions and to represent homecoming, both logos will be used through the week, said Glad-in.

"I think it'll be interesting to see what people say," said Lee. "I've never really designed anything of this scope and it'll be surreal to see my logo on a large banner and know that I made that."

Those who are involved in homecoming planning each year do what they can to find ways to increase student and alumni participation. Allowing a former student to design the logo opens up even more options for involvement.

"Homecoming is a K-State tradition," said Joyal. "Student participation shows spirit and pride, so I think it's important."

As an alumnus, Lee agrees.

"Homecoming is a great experience, and it's part of our school's tradition," said Lee, "and I think everyone should participate because that's what K-State is about - getting together."

Alumni, football team maintains homecoming traditions as years pass

An article from K-State Archives and Manuscripts published in the Collegian on Oct. 28, 1955, describes how the traditions of homecoming celebrations came to be, and they are strikingly similar to those from 50 years ago.

HOMECOMING CHANGES GREATLY IN PAST 40 YEARS

By Mary Beckmeyer
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Forty years ago on Oct. 23, 5,000 people were gathered around a little field singing and clapping as the Aggies came on the field to the tune of "Aggie Loyalty."

This was the scene of K-State's first Homecoming game in 1915. K-State students realized that this idea for a Homecoming Day was a great one, and that it should become a college tradition.

The Homecoming celebration is credited to coach John Bender, head football coach at that time. Bender, who came to K-State from the University of Nebraska-Lincoln, was coaching his first year at K-State in 1915. He suggested that a day be set aside for Homecoming.

Letters were sent to alumni inviting them to the first Homecoming game of Kansas State vs. University of Kansas. High-school seniors from all over the state were admitted to the game free, and 10,000 stickers advertising the event were distributed.

The Friday evening preceding the game, an enthusiastic crowd of 2,500 gathered at the auditorium and then held a snake-dance downtown. Former K-State athletes were awarded big K's, and college entertainment and a dance from 8 p.m. to midnight wound up the first pre-Homecoming events.

The day of the game, visitors swarmed into town. The KU rooters, accompanied by their band, came on a special train. They were met at the station by the Aggie band and 1,000 students. Music resounded through the streets as the entire group marched to the campus.

Game time came, and the Wildcats attacked like a whirlwind. The first half of the game appeared to be an Aggie victory. At halftime, the KU band performed and K-State girls, dressed in white, formed a huge K on the field.

During the fourth quarter KU piled up 19 points to win the game by a score of 19-7.

The first Homecoming Day was such a success that it was established as an annual event. "Second Annual Homecoming, Missouri Tigers vs. Aggie Wildcats - Come, Be a Booster, November 11."

This invitation was printed on thousands of stickers, which were pasted on the letters of loyal Aggies. On Nov. 11, a record-breaking crowd was sending "Old Jay Rah" ringing across the field.

When the final whistle blew, the Tigers were vanquished, and the Wildcats placed the first Homecoming triumph in the records of K-State's history.

Decorating houses and lawns began in 1923 with prizes awarded to the most original. Merchants went "all out" and decorated their shop windows. Railroads made special rates for people going to the game, and a Kansas City radio station broadcast the game. Though there was a deluge of rain, every event except the bicycle races went off as scheduled.

The actual Homecoming parade was instituted in 1927. Judging of the floats in the parade was based on originality and adaptability, just as it is now.

In 1929, Manhattan joined KSAC in welcoming alumni back for the Diamond Jubilee celebration of the founding of Manhattan and for the Kansas State Aggie-Oldahoma University football game.

Homecoming 1923 introduced the varsity dance. There were two big dances that weekend - one on Friday and one Saturday night at the Wareham hotel ballroom. Before the dance on Friday night there was a pajama parade.

K-State's first Homecoming Queen, Jean Underwood of Hoisington, Kan., was selected in 1936. She was elected by votes of the students who bought tickets to the Blue Key dance.

Twenty fraternities decorated their houses and lawns for the 1937 Homecoming. Cars loaded with fraternity men stopped the traffic for several hours, as they made the rounds to see how well their rivals had done.

In 1938, 20,000 persons jammed Manhattan to witness the gigantic 2-mile, 75th anniversary parade and the KU vs. K-State football game. The parade depicted the development of the college during the past 75 years of its existence.

Members of the 1930 football team were guests at the '40 game and sat in a special section. This continued a program started in 1939 to honor football heroes of a decade ago.

The Wildcats defeated a favored Nebraska team 12-6 in the 1941 Homecoming game.

In 1945 no fraternity or sorority houses were decorated in the usual pre-war manner. Panhellenic and the Interfraternity Council voted down decorating organized Greek houses for Homecoming.

"Instead of decorating halfway, let's wait until next year and do it up right," they announced.

And they did "do it up right" - "Victory Homecoming" was the theme of 1946.

Former alumni board members to plan for future of association

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The old will meet the new the week of Oct. 21-27 when more than 80 former K-State Alumni Association board members return to Manhattan to join forces with the current board to plan and discuss the association's future.

Steve Logback, Alumni Association communications director, said the association has not had an event like this for at least 15 years. The meeting is during Homecoming week, and Logback said the former board members will have numerous activities to participate in.

"Homecoming is an exciting time to involve them," Logback said. "The current board is working through a vision and strategic plan for the association. We just wanted to get former board members who are awfully special to the Alumni Association to share their ideas and hear about what the board has been up to."

Logback said in addition to the meeting, former members will have the opportunity to go on tours of the city and campus, touring new buildings like Ackert Hall and the Vanier Football Complex. He said many of the former members have not visited Manhattan or its campus prior to completing their terms years ago.

Former members also will have the opportunity to tour the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum and participate in an ice cream social, ride in a designated former board members trailer in the Homecoming parade, be addressed by President Jon Wefald, attend an exclusive pep rally before the football game and an Aggieville reception after "the big win," Logback said.

Sharon Evers, who was on the board for six years and served as chair from 2001-02, said she is most excited to reconnect with her old colleagues during the weekend's activities.

"We've been talking about doing this for sometime," Evers said, "so I'm really looking forward to seeing some former board members who served at the same time as me, many of whom I have not been able to (contact) since then."

Evers said she was more than happy to accept the invitation because the Alumni Association plays such a major role at the university — a role she said seems to be growing every year — and she is excited about where the association is going.

More than 860 participants ran in the annual 5K homecoming race, Oct. 21. All proceeds of the race went to the First Tee of Manhattan. This was the fifth year the Alumni Association has planned a 5K race.

"The leadership of the Alumni Association is amazing," she said. "I really found that out the years I served as chairman."

Earl McVicker, who served as board national president in 1988, said he thinks the Alumni Association is extremely successful compared to the other universities in the Big 12, but he is looking forward to the meeting because he said there is always room for growth.

"Listening to reports of the association's current situation and planning for the future, hopefully the former members can inspire and provide input on ways we can improve," McVicker said.

K-State student killed in rollover vehicle accident

STAFF REPORTS

A 21-year-old student died in a vehicle accident early Sunday morning in Russell, Kan.

Rebecca Jane Tribble, sophomore in marketing, was the passenger in a 2000 Ford pickup that lost control and rolled several times on a road north of Interstate 40 in her hometown of Russell, according to a report by the Russell County Sheriff's Office.

According to the report, the truck was traveling south on 184th Street at a high speed when it lost control and rolled several times in the west ditch of the road.

The Russell County Dispatch received a call about the accident at 5:51 a.m., and officials responded to the scene and determined it as a one-vehicle accident, according to the report.

The Deputy Russell County Coroner pronounced Tribble dead at the scene. The driver of the vehicle had fled the scene prior to the officials' arrival, according to the report.

The Kansas Highway Patrol is investigating the accident, according to the report.

According to a release from the Office of Student Life, Tribble's brother Ben is a senior in chemical science at K-State.

Heather Reed, assistant dean of student life, said the university communicates with the student's family and friends and also certain departments on campus when a student dies.

Tribble

"We're always very sad when we lose a student and a member of our student body," Reed said. "We send our condolences to her family and friends."

Reed said the university asks the student's family and friends if they would like to have a memorial service on campus, and if so, it is led by the director of religious studies, Eric Schwartz.

However, Reed said many of Tribble's friends are from Russell and will be able to attend the funeral, so there is no campus memorial planned.

Tribble was a 2005 graduate of Russell High School. Memorial services will include a vigil at 7:30 p.m. today and a funeral at 10:30 a.m. Wednesday at St. Mary's Queen of Angels Catholic Church in Russell, according to a release from the Office of Student Life.

Witnesses identify stabbing victim

STAFF REPORTS

Witnesses have helped identify the Fort Riley soldiers involved in a stabbing in Aggieville early Saturday morning.

According to a Riley County Police Department report, witnesses on the scene of the incident that occurred in the parking lot north of Silverado Saloon provided police with information about the soldier who was killed and his attacker.

According to the report, Antonio Ortiz Jr., 24, and Latoya Fields, 23, both soldiers of Fort Riley, were involved in a minor verbal altercation inside Silverado's, which led to a physical altercation across the street and into the parking lot north of the bar.

Fields allegedly stabbed Ortiz multiple times near a parked car, and then Ortiz collapsed in the lot, according to the report. Fields fled the scene in a vehicle driven by a friend before RCPD officers arrived.

Witnesses also told police that Fields and Ortiz had a past romantic relationship, according to the report.

At about 1:53 a.m., RCPD officials found Ortiz in the 1300 block of Laramie Street with a severe puncture wound in his upper abdomen, according to police reports.

Riley County EMS transported Ortiz to Mercy Regional Health Center where Eight laptop computers and a gaming system were allegedly robbed from a kiosk in the Manhattan Town Center last weekend, said Riley County Police Department officials.

Three Toshiba notebook computers, two Hewlett Packard notebook computers, three Hewlett Packard tablet computers, an Xbox 360 Elite gaming system and the locking system were taken from a cabinet in the kiosk, said RCPD Lt. Josh Kyle. The stolen items amounted to $7,850, Kyle said.

The robbery at Manhattan Town Center occurred some time between 10:45 a.m. Friday and 10:45 p.m. Saturday, Kyle said.

Kyle said no further details were available, and the case is under investigation.

Professors strive for FDA approval of stem-cell research

Some might expect an institution like MIT or Harvard to discover a completely new type of stem cell in umbilical cords, but it was first discovered at K-State — by accident.

In 2000, three K-State professors gathered pig umbilical cords to study a group of cells in the connective tissue that possibly could be used to grow other types of cells.

When the professors started studying the umbilical cords, Dr. Daryl Troyer, professor of veterinary medicine, said they found something they were not expecting. He said they found several cells located in the Wharton's jelly, a mucus tissue that protects and insulates cells in the umbilical cord, that showed the typical structure and activity of stem cells.

"We put the Wharton's jelly in the dish and didn't do it in such a way to encourage isolation of the cells, but they grew out in large numbers anyway," Troyer said.

In 2003, Troyer, Duane Davis, professor of animal science and industry and Mark Weiss, professor of anatomy and physiology, co wrote a journal entry on their findings of the new type of treatment using non controversial, readily available stem cells, which they decided to call umbilical cord matrix cells.

After the report was published in several journals, the university and the world soon took notice. A few years later, the Midwest Institute for Comparative Stem Cell Research was established at K-State. The institute receives $350,000 a year as part of the university's Targeted Excellence program, which allots a certain amount of money to a few areas of K-State research.

"That is a big deal because Maria Pyle, research technician, uses a pipette to remove a sample of cells Monday in the Coles Hall Stem Cell Research Lab. The cells can then be examined under a microscope or used for other purposes throughout the lab.

the university thinks this is an area that could move it to the top of land-grant universities," Davis said.

It also is a big deal for countries across the world. Troyer said

Secretary of Defense Robert Gates to present 140th Landon Lecture in McCain, Nov. 26

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Almost one year after former Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld gave a Landon Lecture soon after he announced his resignation from his White House office position, his successor will present the 140th Landon Lecture.

Secretary of Defense Robert Gates will speak at 2:30 p.m.

Nov. 26 in McCain Auditorium.

Charles Reagan, Landon Lecture chairman, said Gates, the fifth secretary of defense to speak in the lecture series, has much to offer the K-State and Manhattan community.

"Look at the position they hold," Reagan said. "What they say is going to affect all of us, especially the youth."

Reagan said Gates, a Wichita native, will shed some light on several important subjects, including the status of the troops in Iraq, which Reagan said is of significant importance to Fort Riley soldiers. Reagan said the lecture will take place in McCain Auditorium because the K-State basketball teams will be using Bramlage Coliseum. Also, audience turnout for previous defense secretaries has not required more space than McCain offers.

"Rumsfeld was the only defense secretary to have it in Bramlage," he said. "McCain has been more than sufficient in the past."

Gates had a number of high governmental positions before he became secretary of defense Dec. 18, 2006. He served as director of the CIA from 1991-93, and was assistant to the president and deputy national security adviser for President George H.W. Bush from 1989-91. He also served as president of Texas A&M University from August 2002 to his acceptance of the secretary of defense position. Gates, who joined the CIA in 1966, has received several honors including the National Security Medal and the Presidential Citizens Medal. He also is a three-time recipient of the CIA's highest award, the Distinguished Intelligence Medal.

The lecture is free and open to the public. More information will be released closer to the date of the lecture.

Other groups participate in predominately greek homecoming event

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The women gathered in Bramlage Coliseum, their matching shirts a splash of purple in a sea of metal bleachers.

Only 14 in number, the members of Poize HipHop Dance Team were small but mighty as they yelled out their cheer at Pant the Chant Monday night.

Poize was one of the few non-greek groups participating in Pant the Chant. This is the dance troupe's second year in existence, and they decided to make themselves known by participating in All-University Homecoming week's Pant the Chant for the first time.

"We really wanted to present ourselves and represent," said Suavé Wesson, sophomore in psychology and Poize member.

Kyana Lee, Poize president and junior in communication sciences and disorders, said the group is trying to buy new uniforms and thought participating in Homecoming would be a "good asset, money-wise."

"Lions and tigers and bears, oh my!" started their chant off with a reference to the Baylor Bears, the K-State football team's opponent this weekend. The rest of the cheer was sprinkled with references to the movie "300" and followed Homecoming's Magic in Manhattan theme.

"We want our name to be out there," said Yui Nishita, senior in hotel and restaurant management and a new Poize member.

Nishita is the assistant director of the Japanese Yosakoi Dance Club, which also performed at Pant the Chant for the first time. The 13 members, most of them women, were decked out in purple robes resembling a cross between Japanese culture and Harry Potter garb, and held white fans, which they whipped every which way.

Apart from the various new groups joining Pant the Chant this year, the residence halls also came to represent the non-greek side of K-State.

Marlatt and Goodnow halls arrived with about 20 people to deliver their chant, and Moore, West and Ford halls and Smurthwaite Leadership House came as a group.

Renee Braun, junior in interior architecture and Goodnow Hall resident, said they used the song "The Magic Stick" to help them create a chant. Braun said she did not think residence halls could compete against greek houses, because members of the greek community spend more time preparing for Homecoming.

"They spend months doing things and a lot of them require people to come to it," Braun said. "We just had to grab people before we left."

Andrew Gunzelman, junior in management information systems and Marlatt resident, said he enjoyed being able to show school spirit at the event.

"It's a fun opportunity to get to know other people while supporting your hall," he said.

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

Demarkus Coleman, sophomore in open option, performs along with other members of Black Student Union during Pant the Chant on Monday evening at Bramlage Coliseum. The event was held as part of All-University Homecoming week. BSU won the student organization category of the event.

Meeting to determine local historic sites

By Brandon Steinert
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A city commission work session will determine which buildings in Manhattan will be considered historic sites at 5 p.m. today.

Karen Davis, city commissioner, said the commission will accept nominations for Manhattan buildings for the National Register of Historic Places.

Davis said the Multiple Property Submission Project is a new process that will determine whether a building has historic value. The process will use cover documents that define historic context and architectural integrity required for nomination to the national registry.

Davis said this is designed to make the nomination process easier, because property owners can nominate multiple buildings at one time, as opposed to doing each one individually.

The cover documents were created after conducting extensive research funded by two grants from the Kansas State Historical Society in February 2006. One cover document is for late 19th and early 20th century residential resources, and the other is for 19th century vernacular stone houses, Davis said.

Davis said sometimes financial incentives like tax cuts or federal grants are distributed to owners of property listed on the state or national register. It also provides protection for the property and will help preserve it.

The meeting will be televised live on local cable channel 3.

TO THE POINT

Greeks set example for homecoming participation

Since K-State's first Homecoming in 1915, K-State's greek community has dominated the Homecoming week scene.

There are 17 sororities and 30 fraternities on campus, according to the Greek Affairs Web site. They organize teams, combining the sororities with fraternities, and spread Homecoming spirit and community service. Last year the homecoming 5k race, which many greeks helped organize, raised money for the Boys and Girls Clubs of Manhattan.

But there is a group often forgotten during Homecoming week. This group is the other 70 percent of the student population on campus.

There are more than 400 student organizations here at K-State, according to www.ksu.edu, and many of them also participate in Homecoming. They must not be forgotten in all the hustle and bustle of the greek version of Homecoming.

Also, Homecoming is an excellent economy booster, a factor often overlooked. The events that occur during Homecoming week bring alumni back from far and wide to Manhattan, where they spend money at local businesses.

Homecoming is about the community. Though greek organizations increase the spirit of the occasion, draw attention to all K-State has to offer, and are most prominent during the celebrations and activities, Homecoming is not for them only.

Other students need to follow the greek community's example and become more involved in Homecoming to help everyone to remember the true meaning of our university's homecoming — to come together and celebrate K-State.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Same ol' tricks

Last November, a number of K-State fans jumped on the Oral Roberts University bandwagon after its basketball team beat KU, though many of these fans knew little about this shady university.

Last week, according to The Associated Press, ORU President Richard Roberts was granted a leave of absence after a number of allegations of illegal activities were brought against him.

Those allegations, filed by three former ORU professors, accused Roberts of mispending donors' contributions on numerous home remodels and a trip to the Bahamas for one of his daughters, among other expenses. The professors also accused Roberts of illegally involving the university in a local political campaign, which would jeopardize the university's nonprofit status.

The professors also claim they were wrongfully fired after they revealed the allegations to the ORU Board of Regents.

Roberts, who stepped down last week, denied the charges, saying at a chapel service God told him to deny the allegations.

Though the professors have said they do not know 100 percent if the allegations are true and also might have taken the allegations too far when they claimed Roberts' wife was seen alone with a young man on numerous occasions, ORU has never been a perfect university.

The university was established by televangelist Oral Roberts in 1963 after he claimed God told him to do so. Now the university of more than 5,000 students has a number of architecturally futuristic buildings, including a giant 60-foot-tall statue of praying hands. The buildings are valued at more than $250 million.

That $250 million came mostly from university alumni and donors, who the elder Roberts milked for decades. According to a Feb. 7, 1972, Time magazine article, Oral Roberts received much of his early financial support from people he touched with his numerous televangelist speeches and healings.

Roberts showed he would stop at nothing to get as much money from his donors as possible. According to the AP report, Oral Roberts told his televangelist show viewers in 1987 that he needed to raise $8 million for the university or he would be "called home" by God.

Many viewers saw this as a sign God would take him to heaven or that he might even kill himself if the money was not raised. He easily reached the $8 million goal.

According to a 1987 Time article, Oral Roberts, before an audience of 6,000 people, also claimed to have raised people from the dead. His son Richard, 37 at the time, backed up the elder Roberts' claim.

SCOTT GIRARD

Jess Boatwright | COLLEGIAN

According to the same Time article, the elder Roberts claimed his wife rescued him from the devil, who tried to strangle him and also sent supposed holy water packets to one million people to cleanse themselves. All that in one year — that's impressive.

Richard, also a renowned televangelist, doesn't seem to have fallen too far from the apple tree — as opposed to his brother, who, according to a 1982 New York Times article, shot himself in the heart after a long battle with depression and drug abuse.

Richard has done a great job continuing the family legacy of faulty and irresponsible fundraising. According to Charity Navigator, an organization that rates fundraising activity for virtually all well-known charities, rated the Oral Roberts Evangelistic Society, which Richard is president of, with one out of four stars.

It's always sad when people like the Robertses use God's name to raise money. They make false claims to get whatever they need, whether it's a new $50 million building or a giant bronze statue of praying hands.

It's hard for me to believe a lunatic like Oral Roberts can raise millions of dollars by spewing ridiculous claims to give people false hope, and he can establish his own university to teach youth his skewed views with this money.

Oral Roberts is not the only person to take advantage of Christians like this — they're everywhere. Organized Christianity's obsession with wealth always confused me, but it's just one of several improprieties of a flawed system.

Rowling outs beloved character to reserve spot in history

While in New York City, the liberal heart of America, it comes as no surprise J.K. Rowling would sell out and discredit one of the best characters in Harry Potter. Like many other public figures, Rowling is abusing her popularity to advance her own political agenda.

After finishing the Harry Potter series, Rowling, barely able to contain herself, enthusiastically declared during her Open Book Tour at Carnegie Hall that Albus Dumbledore was gay. Rowling's turn on the soap box didn't stop there — she continued to preach the underlying theme of her books were tolerance and encouraging people to question authority.

It was the perfect ploy. Anyone who is an avid Harry Potter fan already has bought the entire series and watched the five movies — thus assuring her decision to go political wouldn't have much of an effect on her pocketbook.

Rowling managed to show "genuine surprise" when the audience began clapping at the coming-out speech. According to the Irish Times, after encountering the audience's response to her news she said, "I would have told you earlier if I knew it would make you so happy."

Rowling is either bad at being manipulative or she is dimwitted enough to be surprised that in New York City — where the streets are infested with liberals — people would meet her words with approval and hymns of joy. To her credit, she knows exactly how to impress a group of immoral individuals. Throw in a few comments about "the Man" keeping people down, tolerance and gays, and you've got a group of people who will bend over backward to accommodate.

Furthermore, the fact she didn't even hint in her books Dumbledore was gay suggests she knew it would isolate a lot of her conservative readers. Maybe it was because she understood her decision to quit writing Harry Potter would lead to a dramatic decrease in an interest about her, and the only hope she had to rectify her position was to become immortalized as a god-like figure to liberals.

BRIGITTE BRECHEISEN

It also is important to understand Rowling's political tirade was a staged effort for attention. Rowling preaches her books are about tolerance, yet at best, she cloaked her underlying theme in a veil of deceit. Though gay-rights advocates see this outing as a victory, they really should be questioning her sincerity. Rowling is much more interested in remaining in the limelight than promoting freedom of sexual preference.

According to Entertainment News, Rowling commented on the shock and approval her statement had received by saying, "I had to give you something to talk about for the next 10 years ... Just imagine the fan fiction now."

Whatever reason she had for making one of the best characters in her series gay has angered parents.

According to the Sydney Morning Herald, Laura Mallory, a mother of four from Georgia, responded to Rowling's comments by saying, "My prayer is that parents would wake up, that the subtle way this is presented as harmless fantasy would be exposed for what it really is: a subtle indoctrination into anti-Christian values."

Regardless of whether someone agrees with this statement or not, the point still stands: some parents simply do not have the same values — or lack thereof — that Rowling is attempting to promote.

People should be condemning Rowling's statements for using homosexuals as a tool to sell herself, rather than prematurely praising her.

Rowling should be happy she has satisfied her lust for power through her veritable cacophony of mindless blather by simply taking one of the most revered characters in her well-known children's series and tarnishing his once great image. Thankfully, Dumbledore isn't around to see the mockery Rowling has made of him.

I am truly in mourning for the Wildcats and their loss on Saturday, but at least my fantasy team is 7-0. I have Tom Brady.

Fourum today, Blotter tomorrow.

There was a call made earlier from another greek house on campus saying that Alpha Delta Pi stole chopsticks, and that absolutely cannot be printed. It's not true, it was done in fun, but it's not true, and we don't want something like that associated with our house. So please do not print that or put it on display anywhere. Again, I think it's sad. "Way to steal 150 chopsticks. Lame, ADPI. Lame," and that cannot be printed.

I have no comment.

My friend's tin keeps him warm at night.

So is there anything else you would like to say?

I was running in the Homecoming 5k this weekend, and a cow ran past me running on its hind legs. Then I realized it was a jogger in a cow suit. Weird.

If you do not walk in the crosswalk, I will hit you.

Put your mom in my circle.

Cute chem boy, why, oh why, did you take out your lip ring? You lost, like, 10 points. Seriously.

I like to picture Lydia Peele with a T-shirt with a tuxedo on it. It says she is formal but here to party, too.

Don't you love it when someone changes your Facebook picture to two naked dudes making out, and now your Facebook and your life are gone.

Is it all right to cup another man's genitalia while saying hello?

Dear people not using the crosswalk, don't give me that evil look. I didn't hit you, that should be enough.

I thought I saw Stuni guy, so I scissor-kicked him in back of the head. Turned out it was Pat Bosco.

Don't forget your Power Towel.

Bring it to every game.

Sensual rhythms, fiery lyrics provide enhanced intimate experiences

Boinking, screwing, porking, getting laid. Whatever you call it, sex is one of the most pervasive, controversial and downright enjoyable activities in human history.

Whether it is making love to your significant other or sleeping with that new one-time overnight buddy you recently met at a party, sex generally doesn't happen on the spur of the moment (though I'm sure many of us can recall a personal experience where that wasn't the case). Often a certain mood must be set – and music often is the best way to do just that. Whether you are in for a night of slow, soft love making or a night of fast, hard humping, here are a few albums you should try the next time you plan on doing some horizontal jogging.

CAN, "TAGO MAGO"

One of my favorite albums of all time from one of the greatest bands to come from Germany in the 1970s also happens to be a great album to make love to. Opening with the measured "Paperhouse," this album is perfect for starting slow and ramping up the intensity. The syncopated rhythms of "Mushroom" and "Oh Yeah" pick up the tempo and allow you to prepare for the album's centerpiece, the 20-minute-long "Halleluwah." The song's tribal rhythm will hypnotize listeners, and it will lock you into an extended groove where you won't be able to stop humping in rhythm until the song's grand climax – which, if experienced right, should coincide with your own climax.

MARK

PORTISHEAD, "DUMMY"

Originating in the '90s in Bristol, England, trip-hop was characterized by slow beats and drum fills often mixed with samples, electronic noodling and ethereal vocals to give the listener the impression they were on a musical trip. Portishead added elements of cool jazz and acid house to their music to give their sound a more distinct quality. But what really set Portishead apart was the hauntingly beautiful voice of Beth Gibbons. Her breathy vocals mixed with Geoff Barrow's immaculate compositions melt even the coldest heart once the play button is pressed. This album has held up extremely well since it was released in 1994, and it remains one of the sexiest albums ever made.

BARRY WHITE, "ALL-TIME GREATEST HITS" AND AL GREEN, "AL GREEN'S GREATEST HITS"

I'm not a huge proponent of compilation albums, but for these two troubadours, I'll make an exception. Both White and Green are infamous for their funky and soulful songs about love. First, there's the walrus of love, Barry White. White is known for his rumbling bass voice, but his talent as a composer and producer are often forgotten. One needs look no further than the wonderfully arranged "Love's Theme" or the absolutely brilliant coda at the end of the infamous "Can't Get Enough of Your Love, Babe."

Then there's the sexy Southern crooner Al Green. Before Green converted from the secular world to gospel in the '80s, he was (and remains) one of the premier love-song writers. Who doesn't get goosebumps when they hear the excellent "Let's Stay Together"? And it doesn't get less subtle than "Here I Am (Come and Take Me)." Even "Take Me to the River," a song supposedly about spiritual redemption is actually about passionately losing one's virginity. If you put on either of these records and the panties don't instantly hit the floor, you've got much bigger problems on your hands.

VARIOUS ARTISTS, "SUGAR IN MY BOWL: VINTAGE SEX SONGS 1923-1952"

This ribald collection of bluesy tracks collected mainly from the 1920s and 1930s archives suggestive songs often using food as a metaphor for sex. This collection of songs is sung from mainly female perspectives on sex and proves women are just as sexual as their male counterparts. With song titles like "King Size Papa," "He's Just My Size," "Sam the Hot Dog Man" and "I'm a Mighty Tight Woman," this compilation is guaranteed to turn your crank. But perhaps the album's most stunning track is "Shave 'Em Dry" by Lucille Bogan, which talks about sex in stunning starkness and even uses the F-word with a gripping directness. This album is a wonderful addition to a night of dirty deeds.

THE DOORS, "L.A. WOMAN"

Love 'em or hate 'em, the Doors are one of the most influential and controversial bands to emerge from the '60s. During his time, Jim Morrison was a huge sex symbol, and in addition to writing songs about the Oedipus complex ("The End"), Morrison also wrote some pretty sexy songs. For my money, the best album by the Doors was the last with frontman Morrison. In addition to the seven-minute title track, the album contains such great songs as the bouncy "Love Her Madly," the bluesy "Been Down So Long" and few things will bring greater intimacy than making slow love to the brooding, jazzy "Riders on the Storm."

THE STOOGES, "FUN HOUSE"

Dirty, grimy rock 'n' roll, the title of the Stooges' second album says it all. To enter the world of "Fun House" is to enter the skuzzy underbelly of '70s garage rock. Each song is fueled with sexual tension so thick you can cut it with a knife. The garage raver, "Loose" consists of Iggy Pop's craggy voice backed by a firestorm of punk rock created by his band. This song alone will release your inner animal, and that is just one track. The rest of "Fun House" is filled with barn-burning tracks just oozing with sexual tension. Expect bite marks, nail scratches and other forms of painful pleasures while listening to "Fun House."

'30 Days of Night' leaves viewers wanting more after captivating start

"30 Days of Night"

Movie review by Brendan Praeger

As Halloween approaches, a flood of horror films has begun to hit theaters. This weekend's most prominent offering, "30 Days of Night," stands out in a pack of cookie-cutter horror films – but not by much.

The film follows a recent trend of graphic novel adaptations. While it isn't a frame-by-frame adaptation like "Sin City" or "300," Director David Slade does take a few shots directly from the source material.

The film takes place in Barrow, Alaska, the northernmost town in the United States. On the eve of 30 days of darkness, cell phones disappear, sled dogs are slaughtered, phone lines are cut and the town's only helicopter is gutted. When the sun disappears, a group of vampires descends on the town to feed on the population.

It's an interesting premise, and the film does an excellent job building tension before the first attacks. When the vampires really hit their stride, we see aerial shots of the snowy town filled with bloody attacks and screaming civilians with no chance of escape.

Sadly, after such a strong opening, the rest of film feels like a missed opportunity.

As the town's sheriff (Josh Hartnett) struggles to keep a group of strangers alive, the film keeps its sense of suspense, but the story stops moving forward. We see people fighting to survive, but the little character development feels tacked on rather than expository. When characters die, there's no real sense of loss, and it's hard to root for a protagonist we know little about.

The vampires' stories also receive little attention. Instead of creating an interesting mythology, which have been strong points in recent vampire films like "Underworld" and "Blade," the vampires' existence goes relatively unexplained.

While the film loses steam, it never becomes boring. Watching the vampires stalk the helpless citizens is entertaining enough to please horror fans, and the excellent cinematography helps to divert attention from cheesy dialogue and a relatively weak finish.

If you're a fan of the horror genre, "30 Days of Night" is worth checking out. As long as you don't go into the theater expecting a classic, you probably won't be disappointed.

Fantasy football free agents available

For several fantasy-football team owners, a great deal of their Sundays are spent in a command center consisting of a lap-top computer equipped with high-speed Internet access and a high-definition television.

ANDY NELSON

For weeks, they make crucial decisions could either make or break their fantasy-football season, or much worse, cause them to suffer through the smack talk sure to ensue after suffering a loss to an annoying roommate.

Nearing the halfway point in the NFL season, injuries, bye weeks and lackluster performances have many fantasy-team owners scratching at the bottom of the barrel to fill in players from week to week. Don't despair; there still might be some good free agents out there.

If you are stuck in the middle of a quarterback quandary for week eight because Tony Romo is on a bye week, there might be an answer. The best option that still could be available in many leagues is Derek Anderson of the Cleveland Browns. While he has not really proven himself against tougher defenses, his statistics are impressive overall. Through six weeks of play, Anderson has passed for 14 touchdowns and run in two more. He will be throwing the ball against a St. Louis Rams defense that hemorrhages points — so he should do well.

In the area of wide receivers and tight ends, the first players to look at would be those on the receiving end of the man with the golden hand. Every time New England Patriots quarterback Tom Brady throws the ball, it seems to result in a touchdown. Next week against the Washington Redskins, there isn't too much of a reason this should change.

Patriot's receiver Randy Moss has received much of the attention for the team, but there are a few players being overlooked in some fantasy leagues. Wes Welker has scored four touchdowns in the last two games and racked up 262 yards. Additionally, he has been returning kickoffs, and with his speed, he is always a threat.

Patriots tight end Ben Watson had been getting a lot of attention from Brady, scoring five times in six games. He went down last week with an ankle injury and was replaced by Kyle Brady, who went on to score in each of his last two games. Brady to Watson seems to be a decent combination until Watson returns, and Kyle Brady is still available in almost every league.

Outside of New England, New York Giants' Amani Toomer could be a good option as wide receiver. He has scored in the last two weeks and is averaging about five receptions a game. Toomer is usually Eli Manning's second choice if he cannot find Plaxico Burress, and since the Giants are playing a Miami defense that has allowed the most points, he could get a lot of looks.

If a running back is needed to plug in for next weekend, it could be slim pickings trying to find a decent free agent. The Detroit Lions' Kevin Jones ran for 76 yards and a touchdown in week seven and is still available in many leagues. However, if Cincinnati Bengals running back Rudi Johnson is still out, Kenny Watson could be the best bet after coming off of a three-touchdown game on Sunday.

Equestrian member makes 'Snyder' name her own

KSU SPORTS INFORMATION
Whitney Snyder, the daughter of former K-State football coach Bill Snyder, said she wants to be known for more than her famous father.

By Adam Ashmore
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It would seem growing up with the Snyder last name in Manhattan would have its perks for K-State equestrian team member Whitney Snyder.

However, being the daughter of former K-State football coach Bill Snyder has left Whitney with the task of escaping the shadows of her family name and creating her own identity at K-State.

"I want to be known as Whitney, not as Bill Snyder's daughter," Snyder said.

It is the determination to make it on her own that has allowed Snyder to pursue her passion for horses and the K-State equestrian team.

Snyder said she owes her enthusiasm to participate on the equestrian team not only to the competitive component but to the joy it brings her.

"Riding is my passion; my horses mean more to me than anything," she said. "The enjoyment it gives me and the atmosphere of the barn is what keeps it fun."

When she was 9 years old, Snyder received her first pony, Mystic, from her parents. This gift has had a profound affect on where she is today.

Receiving Mystic, her first pony, is the first horse-riding memory Snyder has and she credits that moment for laying the foundation of her love for horses.

Despite an early passion for horses, Snyder has not always wanted to be a member of the K-State equestrian team. It took a tough academic freshman year to propel her toward the team.

"I needed to make a change, and I felt like joining the team would help add some structure to my life," Snyder said.

She credits joining the team with improving not only as a rider but as a student as well.

Snyder admits she has

So far this season, Baylor has posted an unimpressive 3-5 overall record and still is looking for its first win in conference play.

However, coach Ron Prince said the Bears' record is not an accurate measure of their level of play.

"I think their record is a little bit deceiving," he said. "This is a good opponent. The head coach is a person I respect. He's a tough guy. He puts his team together in the right way and works hard at it."

"I can see the team getting better each year with the kind of people they're putting in their program and around it."

Baylor is ranked third in the Big 12 Conference in passing offense, netting an average of 284.9 yards per game. K-State is right up there with Baylor, in fourth position with an average of 284.4 yards per game. Both teams are tied for second in the conference in sacks, with 20 sacks total on the year.

"They are ranked ahead of us in passing," Prince said. "That's how dedicated they are to it. It's a system credit and a credit to their players. They have good players that they try to get the ball to, and they're very accomplished when they do that."

So far this season, K-State has given up the lowest number of sacks in the conference. The front five are protecting sophomore quarterback Josh Freeman well, only allowing him to hit the turf five times this season. Baylor only has allowed nine sacks this season against sophomore quarterback Blake Szymanski.

"HARD-HITTING" GAME

The Oklahoma State game was one of the closer games of the year, bringing back memories of the losses against Auburn and Kansas earlier this season.

Prince said there were several positives that came from the game, including when the Cowboys went for the touchdown on fourth down from K-State's one-yard-line and failed to get the first down and score.

"It was a hard-hitting game, a very physical game," he said. "I thought the goal-line stand was terrific for us as a defense to make that kind of stand. We were able to get a turnover and once again, keep them from getting points on a deep ball."

Ultimately, one positive was K-State's score with 1:10 left that took almost 3 minutes off the clock. Prince said the team kept driving for the end zone down to the wire.

"There was no lack of confidence," he said. "There was no one on the offensive side of the huddle

STEM CELL | Professor focuses animal research

several labs have been set up, especially in Europe, to study the same matrix cells the K-State professors discovered.

"It just seems like new things are surfacing everyday," Troyer said.

Troyer said after they released a report on their findings in 2003, they decided to focus on different areas of the stem cells' possibilities.

THE RESEARCH

Troyer said his research focuses on improving the use of cells as delivery mechanisms, which means the stem cells would be able to hone in on treating damaged cells with immune-system detection and treat them.

"You have a way to use these almost like a Trojan horse," Troyer said. "It's a very intriguing idea."

This type of research would allow for non-invasive treatment — without needles — for illnesses like cancer and Parkinson's disease. He said test results from rat models have shown the matrix cells are effective for treating several different types of cancer, especially breast cancer.

He said he introduced cancer cells to rat models and then fed them genetically engineered stem cells that migrated to the tumors and significantly reduced the size of the tumor. He also said the tumor was reduced even more with a low dose of chemotherapy or other therapeutic treatments.

Weiss, who shares a lab with Troyer and several assistants, said his research focuses more on using the stem cells for cell recovery and regrowth, especially for Parkinson's.

Weiss said stem cells markedly reduced brain-cell degeneration in rats with Parkinson's. He said the researchers have two hypotheses about the usefulness on Parkinson's: the cells can recover dying cells, and they also can improve the immune system.

"We think that Parkinson's disease has collateral damage to the immune system, and this work shows very clearly that the cells have important suppressive abilities," he said.

Though Troyer and Weiss have several assistants within the institution, they said they do not have nearly enough people to study other possible sources of stem cells.

"There's so much we'd like to do, but we can't because there's just not enough people," Troyer said.

GETTING THE WORD OUT

Now that K-State researchers have tested the effectiveness of stem cells on several diseases in rats, Weiss said they are hoping to take that research to the human drug market and clinics across the United States.

Weiss said the researchers are almost ready to begin the five-year process of getting the matrix-cell treatment studied and approved by the Food and Drug Administration. He compared the approval process to getting a driver's license for the first time.

"We're kind of at the first step," Weiss said. "We have a learner's permit right now. We need to formalize that into a full, independent driver's license."

Weiss said though the stem cells have tested positively in rats, that does not mean it is on track to be approved by the FDA. He said almost 95 percent of drugs are not approved by the FDA. He said the approval process should be a long and arduous five-year project.

"It may be a little faster, or it may be a little slower," Weiss said. "We are trying to be careful so it goes faster though."

"There's a lot of opportunities to mess up and get out of line."

Weiss also said the project possibly will cost more than $100 million just to get the drug on the market.

USES IN ANIMALS

Duane Davis, one of the three professors to discover the cells, said he focuses on several different uses of the cells, especially in livestock animals.

He said his research is more basic than Weiss' and Troyer's research because much less is known about the cells' possible use in animals like pigs. He said much of the human research, such as the use of genetically engineered homing cells to reduce cancerous tumors, also can be applied to pigs. He also said he is looking at taking stem cells from bone marrow because they are less differential and more basic, which might translate better for livestock treatment.

Weiss said the same matrix cells can be found in several kinds of species, including bovine and canine.

Along with his continuing work on determining the use of stem cells in various livestock species, Davis said he is also in charge of setting up a stem-cell research curriculum for K-State students in veterinary medicine, animal sciences and other related fields of study to receive a certificate.

He said this curriculum would include 15 hours of coursework, seven of which will be required stem-cell research classes.

"This could be incorporated into graduate students' work," Davis said. "This would also be an added benefit to have specialization in this type of field."

Weiss said the program should be ready in the near future.

"In a few years, I really hope that will be an option for four or five students," Weiss said.

Almost seven years after their discovery, Davis, Troyer and Weiss still meet about once a week to discuss and collaborate their research. Troyer said they originally established the stem-cell research institution to incorporate multiple areas of study.

"The idea was to foster a lot of interdisciplinary focus on the research," Weiss said. "When we meet, it's really kind of like sparks flying in the room."

who went out there for that drive with four minutes to go who didn't think we weren't going to go and move the ball and score."

PRINCE JUSTIFIES TWO-POINT CONVERSION

With little more than a minute left, K-State scored a touchdown and made a two-point conversion to put the team up by one. Though some might see it as fool-hardy, Prince vouched for his decision.

"It made it more convenient in that situation that we were on the road," he said. "We were in control of the situation and could have ended the thing right then and there. That was the mentality."

Though it didn't end up being enough to secure a victory, Prince said there were mental things at play with the decision.

"I want to play aggressively," he said. "I want my players to know that I have confidence in them and I want them to play aggressively. We're going to try to play to win."

"My team means a lot to me, and I never want to let them down," she said. "When my grades are not what they should be, I feel like I am letting them down."

Despite the local fame of her last name, Snyder always has been very close to her family and feels her upbringing was normal.

"It was normal to us — we just grew up with what we knew," Snyder said.

Growing up with a father who was always in the limelight only made Snyder a stronger person and a more motivated rider. She said the experience has helped her deal with criticism and gives her the extra push to make a name for herself.

With a strong start to the 2007 season and an incentive to someday coach at the collegiate level, Snyder is trying to make a name for herself at K-State — a name that is synonymous with horseshoes and saddles, not pigskin and pads.

Risking aid

Students rally to repeal penalty for drug conviction

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Each year students across the nation fill out the Free Application for Federal Student Aid, and when they do, there's a small box under Question 31 that – if marked – can cost them significant federal aid.

College students in the United States and Canada rallied against this question, which asks students if they have been convicted for the possession or sale of illegal drugs, last week as part of the Students for Sensible Drug Policy's week of action.

Tom Angell, government relations director for SSDP, said about 40 campuses participated in the week of action against the Aid Elimination Penalty, though K-State was not one of them.

"We try to emphasize this penalty doesn't just hurt individual students, it hurts every American taxpayer by hurting the economy," Angell said.

THE PENALTY

The penalty is part of the Higher Education Act that was signed in 1965 "to strengthen the educational resources of our colleges and universities and to provide financial assistance to students in post-secondary and higher education," according to the act.

Angell said Congress reauthorizes the act about every five to seven years, and the last reauthorization was in 1998 when an amendment was made to the act causing students to lose their financial aid for drug convictions.

"We've been mobilizing students ever since day one in working to try to repeal that penalty," Angell said, "and it is not just a bunch of students that are angry about this. We have prominent education groups, like the National Education Association, and folks concerned with addiction recovery."

Angell said he has heard the Committee on Education, Health, Education, Labor and Pensions plans to reauthorize the act before the end of the year.

"It's tough to tell," he said. "We keep hearing different things. That's one of the things I've learned at Washington D.C. I've learned that Congress basically does things on their own schedule, and they usually don't give you a good advance warning."

According to an Oct. 10 release from the organization, SSDP wants the penalty to be repealed to help stop "the war on drugs from becoming a war on education." The release states that the penalty "causes more, not less, drug abuse and crime in our society by limiting young people's opportunities for success."

According to the release, the organization is a network of students who "are concerned about the impact drug abuse has on our communities, but who also know that the war on drugs is failing our generation and our society."

cy has affected. She has not seen any FAFSAs that have had the non-eligible flag during the year she has worked at K-State.

If students answer yes to being convicted for the sale or possession of illegal drugs while filling out the FAFSA, students can enter their information into a worksheet to determine if they are eligible.

However, the form states students who were convicted before they turned 18 and were not tried as adults, and students who had the conviction removed from their record, do not have to select yes on the form.

Bushnell damaged by fire

By Andy Heintz
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An early morning fire damaged more than $100,000 of electric equipment in Bushnell Hall on Tuesday, according to a K-State media release.

According to a K-State Media Relations release, Steve Galitzer, director of environmental health and safety, said the fire most likely was caused by a battery charger that overheated.

"There is always risk when you use a battery charger of any kind," Galitzer said. "They can malfunction or overheat, which can cause a fire."

According to the release, a security officer reported a fire at 4:30 a.m. Tuesday in Bushnell 211. No one was in the building at the time of the fire, and there were no injuries reported.

The $100,000 damage was done to computers and lab instruments in the room, but the total dollar estimate of damages to the room are incomplete.

The room was being used as a lab by John Blair, distinguished professor of biology, for his research on the Konza Prairie, according to the release.

Along with equipment, Galitzer said some areas in the room also were damaged.

"There was damage to the windows," Galitzer said. "The ceiling and wall will need to be repainted."

According to the release, the room beneath the Bushnell 211 also experienced water damage.

Greeks' projects damaged

By Brandon McAtee
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Homecoming projects were found vandalized outside a fraternity early Tuesday morning, the organization's internal vice president said.

Ben Bode, internal vice president of Lambda Chi Alpha, said its Homecoming yard art and a piece of its float were found damaged at 3 a.m. on Lambda Chi's property.

"We had a 15-foot Anderson Hall replica turned down and broken apart, and a Cinderella carriage made of chicken wire and framed out by 2-by-4s ready to complete for the float, but it was rolled across our property and destroyed," said Bode, a sophomore in mechanical engineering. "The Anderson Hall was done, with at least $300 invested in that, and an unknown amount in the carriage."

Bode said a member of the fraternity said he saw someone jump into a white van and drive away after destroying the Homecoming art.

Lambda Chi, Sigma Pi, Alpha Delta Pi and Zeta Phi Beta are Homecoming partners and constructed the float and yard art together.

Amanda Robinson, president of Alpha Delta Pi, declined to comment.

"It is really disheartening because that is not what this weekend is about," she said. "It is not about the competition and if you are greek or not. We need to remember that this week is about pride and getting behind the school and football team."

Bode said the group will spend more money to make repairs. He said the group is hoping event organizers "can change the order of the judging to buy more time, and move it later into the day."

ART IN THE 'VILLE

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Allison Hadley, junior in chemistry and pre-medicine, and Michelle Beckenbaugh, freshman in biology and pre-medicine, work on the Alpha Xi Delta sign for Paint the 'Ville. Paint the 'Ville is an opportunity for campus organizations and All-University Homecoming pairings to decorate Aggieville business windows with the Homecoming theme "Magic in Manhattan." The 20 pairings and organizations painted bars, dining establishments and retail clothing stores in the business district.

Faculty members make progress at Kabul University

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State representatives have made progress at Kabul University in Afghanistan since a contractual agreement took place six months ago to improve two academic sections at Kabul, said two K-State faculty members who have visited the university.

Suzanne Donnelly, K-State instructor of international programs, and Garth Thompson, K-State professor of mechanical and nuclear engineering, spoke about their Kabul experiences Tuesday afternoon at the Little Theatre in the K-State Student Union.

Donnelly said when she first arrived in August at her Kabul office, she was told it had been at least 15 years since someone used the space. Her first objective was to make the space ready to meet with faculty members. She also said university buildings had broken windows and bullet holes in their walls, and a pencil sharpener did not exist in the English department building. Warfare has taken place in Afghanistan for more than 25 years.

Despite inadequate facilities, Donnelly said English teachers in Kabul set high expectations and standards for their department. A decision-making process was established to help aid those high standards, she said.

"What was really different about this project than any other project they had experienced that they told me was that this was the first time that anyone had involved them in the decision-making process," Donnelly said. "In a partnership, we thought that was a little different. A partnership meant we work together and make those decisions, and so that's really the way I've approached it."

Donnelly said six principles guided faculty members during the decision-making process – high expectations, challenging content, quality instruction, appropriate assessments, full language proficiency and shared responsibility.

"They want challenging content – right now, they have none," Donnelly said. "They have no books. They have no syllabuses. I think the last syllabus designed – that I could find – was in 1976, so it's pretty old."

K-State and Kabul University representatives signed two three-year contracts worth $5.5 million on April 25 to improve Kabul's College of Engineering and the English department. K-State also signed a $2 million contract with the University of Balkh in Afghanistan. World Bank supplied the funds for both contractual agreements.

Yar Ebadi, K-State's College of Business Administration dean, said English will be used as a medium of instruction

ROCKIES BLAME HACKERS FOR TICKET-SALES SYSTEM FAILURE

The Colorado Rockies on Tuesday will take another shot at selling World Series tickets online, a day after a team official said its online ticket system was targeted by unknown miscreants.

At noon, the Rockies will put up for sale about 60,000 tickets for the team's three World Series games against the Boston Red Sox, scheduled for next week in Denver. Fans will have a chance to buy the tickets from the Rockies Web site.

On Monday, the Rockies were forced to suspend online World Series ticket sales after the team's online ticketing service, which is operated by Paciolan — a technology provider based in Irvine, Calif. — was brought down by a flood of 8.5 million hits.

Late yesterday, Keli McGregor, Rockies team president, said the outage was the result of a coordinated effort by unknown outsiders. "Our Web site, and ultimately our fans and our organization, were the victim of an external, malicious attack that shut down the system and kept our fans from being able to purchase their World Series tickets," McGregor said in a statement.

ILLEGAL MUSIC DOWNLOAD SITE SHUT DOWN AFTER POLICE RAID

OINK.cd has been shut down after a police raid that exposed the alleged organizer of the illegal download site. OINK is a subscription-based Web site that offers pre-release illegal music downloads for free. The site has more than 180,000 members, and relies on user donations to make money. Users share the music with each other using the program BitTorrent.

After a two-year investigation, the site was shut down and its servers seized in Amsterdam. A 24-year-old man was arrested as he is believed to be the owner of the site.

Everyone involved with the site is now reportedly under criminal investigation, including users. A message was posted in place of the site reading, "This site has been closed as a result of a criminal investigation by IFPI, BPI, Cleveland Police and the Fiscal Investigation Unit of the Dutch Police (FIOD ECD) into suspected illegal music distribution."

CLINTON FILM DRAWS LARGE INTERNET AUDIENCE

The trailer to a new film about Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton, "Hillary Uncensored — Banned by the Media," has garnered big audience numbers — about 1 million viewers — on the Internet. The movie documenting alleged campaign-finance violations soon will have several screenings in the Northeast, including three in New Hampshire, the state that will hold the first presidential primary.

The trailer to the documentary was the most-viewed video on Google Video for eight straight days (Oct. 13-20), and dropped to the No. 2 spot on Sunday. The trailer also was the only political video to make it onto Google's Top 100 video list.

Commissioners discuss convenient way to nominate property for National Register

Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

City commissioners discussed new cover documents to ease the process of nominating properties to be placed on the National Register of Historic Places at their meeting last night in City Hall.

This new process would create the means to nominate properties in a much easier and cost-effective fashion, city officials said.

Tom Roberts, chair of the historic resources board, said the city received a $21,000 grant from the State Historic Preservation Office in February 2006. With this money, he said the city and its consultants created cover documents that will provide an easy reference to any individual wanting to nominate a property. The documents contain information as to whether or not a house fits the definition of historic, Roberts said.

"(The document) makes it easier for people — the public — who are interested in designating a home to be a historic property, so they don't have to do all the research," he said.

The nomination process can cost anywhere from $1,000 to $1,500, but because of the information provided in the cover documents, individuals should not have to hire a consultant to help them, which Roberts said can save them money.

The possibilities of preserving historic districts of Manhattan can help the city promote tourism and keep property values high, Roberts said.

However, he said property must not only be a certain age, but it must also have historic importance to be placed on the national register.

"We are not trying to save everything that is old," Roberts said.

Commissioner Bob Strawn said the commission has a goal to preserve Manhattan but not to the point of stalling development.

"Then it comes down to defining what is truly historic so you don't get in the way of progress, and it's possible to do that," Strawn said.

Roberts said, the creation of these documents is the second stage of a process. He said several years ago, the city received a grant to bring in a consultant who made recommendations for possible Manhattan historic properties.

The cover documents were completed last spring, city officials said, and submitted for review to the Cultural Resources Division of the Kansas State Historical Society. The forms will be sent for approval by the Kansas Historic Sites Board of Review this December.

Research focuses on food students waste in dining halls

By Jenna Scavuzzo
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State student, the director of Kramer Dining Center and an assistant professor in the Department of Housing and Dining Services formulated the research project "All Taste, No Waste" in an effort to educate K-State dining residents about the environmental effects of food waste.

Research team members weighed the disposed food and beverage waste at Kramer Dining Center after every meal for five days during the first week of their research project, said Kelly Morrell, senior in hotel and restaurant management, who is also undergraduate management assistant at Kramer Dining Center and a hospitality intern. At the end of the five-day period, about 2,000 pounds of food and beverage waste was found, not including water.

Because K-State's Housing and Dining Services provides "all-you-can-eat" dining for students at each meal, residents often put more food on their plate than necessary. Breads, pastas and self-serve foods were wasted most, Morrell said.

The team formulated its research project idea through observing the amount of waste students disposed each day, but the members did not realize how immense the issue of food waste was until they gathered the week's scale results, she said.

"Seeing the amount of food and beverage waste was really shocking," Morrell said. "Our goal is to help students realize that their portion sizes are way too large and need to be reduced."

"I also want to open students' eyes to the fact that they have the opportunity to make a positive impact on preserving resources. Food and beverage tray waste at the end of each meal is typically substantial."

The research team actively is attempting to help dining-hall residents realize the harmful effect of food waste and ultimately improve their ability to utilize resources, said Sheryl Powell, Kramer Dining Center director. The team is encouraging students to take smaller portions at meals, reminding residents that they are allowed to go back and take more food if they are still hungry after their first portion.

"Reducing waste in our operations is my main goal, but I am also educating students about what they can each do to make a positive impact," Morrell said. "Ultimately, reducing waste isn't possible without educating those who waste."

For the past few weeks and for the following month, information will be shared through table tents, posters and surveys to inform and educate students about the environmental effects of waste and how Housing and Dining Services is working toward being more environmentally conscious, Morrell said.

This excessive waste negatively affects the environment, said Mary Molt, assistant professor in Housing and Dining Services. The research team hopes to reduce the amount of waste in its operations that eventually ended up in landfills or waste streams.

"We are running out of room on our planet to store this waste," Molt said. "Our resources throughout our world are diminishing, so we need to utilize what we have. There are only so many landfills and waste streams, and we're putting an enormous, overly excessive amount of waste into them."

Creating new landfills to rid excessive waste and disposing of waste in sewer systems also takes human and electrical power, Powell said. It also costs to grow, produce and ship the food itself. Energy and cost to both produce and dispose excess food is used and ultimately wasted, she said.

The immense amount of waste that consumers are shoving into landfills and streams cannot be reused. The wasted food and beverage amount could be used to feed impoverished families, Morrell said. Each year in the United States, federal statistics state that U.S. citizens waste about 27 million tons of food, but citizens only divert less than 3 percent of this to recycling and composting programs, she said. Because about 9 million U.S. families are impoverished each year, this statistic disturbs the research team.

"The whole idea of wasting food bothers me," Powell said. "There are lots of countries that don't have a lot to eat, and we need to be more mindful of that. We shouldn't be huge consumers when we don't need to be. There are so many families still going hungry."

Team members said they are hopeful that food and beverage waste will decrease because of their project.

"I want to educate our residents about the environmental impact of waste and motivate them to make a positive difference," Morrell said. "Whether the waste goes up, down or remains the same, we will learn a lot about the social habits of this age group."

TO THE POINT

Drug crime penalties too harsh for students

According to the policies of the Federal Government, being convicted of drug possession makes you less worthy to receive money than being convicted of murder.

When applying to receive financial aid using the FAFSA form, there is a box asking if the applicant has ever been convicted of drug-related crimes.

If that box gets checked, forget about receiving any money from the government.

The policy was instituted in an effort to fight the war on drugs, and the Federal Government decided to make drug convictions punishable by excommunication from the program.

This seems a little overboard, as one of the things people learn while in college is how to overcome their mistakes.

Students For a Sensible Drug Policy, a group unrepresented on K-State's campus, campaigns for the reversal of that law.

The group writes letters to government officials in an attempt to change the minds of those who write the policies in question.

A Congressional committee is looking at the reauthorization of this penalty, and that committee includes Kansas Sen. Pat Roberts.

K-State students should follow this lead and actively try to get this penalty repealed.

While possession of drugs is illegal, students should get more than one chance when it comes to situations like this.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

School districts have been forced to play mommy and daddy to children as if they were a daycare center for many kids. However, if a school district perceives a major problem, then it should work to solve the problem without usurping or compromising the parents' role and responsibility for their children.

CHRISTINA FORSBERG

Public middle schools in Maine have given us another example of the state arbitrarily inserting itself between a child and parent with a blanket policy weakening parents' roles as legal guardians of their own children.

According to an Oct. 19 Associated Press report, parents and the Bishop of Maine were shocked to hear school officials have allowed King Middle School in Portland to make a full range of contraception available to middle-school students through the school's health clinic. King Middle School is the first in Maine to offer contraceptives to students as young as 11 years old.

Parents of middle-school students are stuck with an all-or-nothing decision for their children — they can either grant their child access to all the school health clinic's services, which now include contraception, or refuse to sign and prevent the child from using any of the health services offered by the clinic.

Other states — like Maryland — already have had this system in their public schools for years, and many purport offering birth control in middle schools actually has led to a decline in unwanted pregnancies over a decade.

The problem these policies are attempting to address is quite clear — the prevention of unwanted pregnancies in a population arguably still defined as children. While there is questionable data about just how much of a problem this really is, the debate the school's policy is generating is likely to avoid the distinctions needed to separate the two key questions.

First, there is the moral question, which most are likely to focus on, as to whether middle-school children should be having sex at all.

The other key question is whether any school or other third party should be compromising parents' responsibilities by forcing them to choose between their moral values and their children's health with an all-or-nothing policy.

Since parents are held legally responsible for their children in so many ways until they turn 18 years old, the last thing the school — or the power of the state in any form — should be doing is driving yet another wedge of reproductive secrecy between the parent and child.

Consider an example when parents — despite a personal preference that their child is not given birth control — consent so the child has access to the school's health clinic. What happens when their daughter, who took advantage of the birth control, ends up pregnant.

Yes, even the best birth control is not fool-proof. It is still possible to get pregnant. Will the school take financial responsibility for delivering and raising a child born to an 11-, 12- or 13-year-old? I bet the parents won't find the school health clinic helpful at that point.

Portland middle schools should give parents a new option — the ability to use specific medications and prescriptions for their children.

Those parents who favor providing birth control to their own children are perfectly free to do so with or without the school's assistance.

Nobel Prize winner should know not to make racist remarks

Linda Ellerbee, an anchor for NBC, once said, "People are pretty much alike. It's only that our differences are more susceptible to definition than our similarities."

Equality between races and cultures always has been a focal point of what the United States stands for. The Declaration of Independence states, "All men are created equal."

From the Civil War to the battle for civil rights, we have attempted to spread equality throughout our country.

The fight for equality has taken many years. As generations come and go, we see race less as a factor, while acceptance and equality come to the forefront. However, we all know relatives or friends who are not this way. Many of these people grew up in a time, or were raised in families where racist comments were more common and acceptable.

According to CNN, 79-year-old James Watson, who won the Nobel Prize in 1962 for discovering the double-helix structure of DNA, was fired from his research lab and forced to cancel his book tour because of racist remarks he made.

Officials at the museum that Watson led for almost 40 years in Cold Spring Harbor Laboratory in New York said "his words had gone past the point of acceptable debate."

In an Oct. 14 interview with the London Times, Watson said he felt Africa's future did not look bright because "all our social policies are based on the fact that their intelligence is the same as ours, whereas all the testing says not really."

He also believes there is no reason different races separated by geography should have evolved identically. Though he said he hoped everyone was equal, "People who have to deal with black employees find this is not true."

This man was a well-respected scientist, a Nobel Prize winner and author of many books. It is unacceptable for a man of his grandeur and fame to make a statement of this sort — even his age is no excuse.

Also, as people get older, they seem to lose tact. They have a tendency to say what they feel or believe without concern for what is politically correct. If this is the case, Watson should have stepped down years ago.

This comment was not an isolated occurrence for Watson, who has made statements similar to the one he made on Oct. 14.

In 1997, in Britain's London Telegraph, Watson claimed that if scientists were to isolate the homosexual gene, women should be allowed to have an abortion based on the finding of this gene.

During a lecture in 2000, he said there might be a link between skin color and sexual prowess, and between weight and a person's ambition level.

Lastly, during a British documentary in 2003, Watson claimed stupidity is a genetic disease that should be treated.

Statements like these are proof that his latest comment was imminent. The scientific community should have stopped him before this recent comment so he might have been able to retire with his dignity.

Avoiding linking race with stupidity is a lesson he should have included in his book, "Avoid Boring People: Lessons from a scientist."

Red Sox will take AL Crown

For once, the team that stepped out decisively from the beginning of the baseball season was not the New York Yankees.

Though the Yankees showed their faces during the American League playoffs as a wild-card team, they folded to the Cleveland Indians the way they have all season.

This, after all, was the team that was 16 1/2 games behind the Red Sox and sitting in last place in the AL East at one point.

The Red Sox have been strong all year.

They consistently have been at the top of the AL standings. They staved off a late run by the Yankees to clinch the East with one game to play and didn't have to face the Yanks in the postseason. They decimated the Los Angeles Angels, taking them down in three games by a combined score of 19-4.

Then they moved on to the Indians, stepped out with a commanding 10-3 victory in Game One, fell behind 3-1 and powered their way back in the last three games of the American League Championship Series. They beat Cleveland by a combined total of 30-5 in the last three games.

They've had pretty stellar pitching along the way, with Josh Beckett posting a 3-0 record in the playoffs, Curt Schilling posting a 2-0 record and several others have pitched their way to victory.

With Beckett in the rotation, Boston has a distinct edge in pitching over the Rockies.

There's also the fact that with the All-Star Game win, the AL clinched home-field advantage for the first two games. Beckett and Schilling will pitch in front of thousands of rabid Boston fans, hoping to regain the magic of 2004.

Don't kid yourselves — just because the Red Sox finally dodged the dreaded Curse of the Bambino doesn't mean they don't want to win another World Series.

The Rockies are red hot right now. They were in a do-or-die position, won 21 of their last 22 games and were able to knock off the Philadelphia Phillies and the Arizona Diamondbacks. Boston better be ready for the sizzling team from Denver right now.

However, the Rockies don't have what Boston has. Boston's lineup is one of the best in baseball with Manny Ramirez, David Ortiz and Kevin Youkilis making up the heart of the Red Sox order.

Ramirez has 14 RBI this postseason, including a three-run homer in the bottom of the ninth against the Angels on Oct. 5 to catapult Boston to a 6-3 victory.

Big Papi, of course, needs no introduction. Though his stats have not been amazing during the playoffs (only three home runs, six RBIs), that also could be because several pitchers have been intentionally walking him, rather than running the risk of Papi hitting the ball outside the park.

Love them or hate them, the Boston Red Sox should be the World Series Champions. They probably will jump to a 2-0 lead at Fenway Park, lose at least one game on the road and then finish it in Beantown.

I'm just glad to see someone other than the Yankees dominate the American League.

Facility allows athletes to practice regardless of weather conditions

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For times when Kansas' unpredictable weather is too fierce, the K-State golf teams have a place to continue their practice.

The new K-State Golf Fieldhouse Development Indoor Facility at Colbert Hills Golf Course will allow both the men's and women's teams to practice under the protection of a roof, analyze their swings using video, and see what they need to change in their putting game.

"It just increases our number of practice opportunities in February," said women's golf coach Kristi Knight. "When our spring season kicks up in late January, a lot of times we are at the mercy of Mother Nature. This just gives us more opportunities to be productive in practice and just have many opportunities to hit balls."

Project coordinator Bernie Haney proposed the idea in a letter to donors, which asked for donations to start the project.

Funding for the project came from Fieldhouse Development President Zac Burton, a former quarterback at K-State, and from the supporters of Chip-In for K-State.

"We were definitely truly appreciative of Zac and Amber Burton in terms of what they have done to make this facility possible for Kansas State golf," Haney said. "They have been tremendous supporters, and we would not have been able to pursue the project if it wasn't for their help."

The facility officially opened Oct. 14 with drives

Team places 7th in fire-raging region

By Mike DeVader
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With the Southern California wildfires raging less than 50 miles away, the Wildcat men's golf team hit the links at the Club Glove Intercollegiate at Saticoy Country Club in Somis, Calif.

The diverse field and challenging course presented enough problems for the Wildcats, but the tournament got tougher when they had to battle the same strong, dry winds that fueled fires some 45 miles from the golf course.

"There are times when there are controlled fires at Colbert Hills," coach Tim Norris said. "At one point a fire was 8 miles away, and it was unhealthy to be out there, but I think our players handled it well."

The Wildcats finished the tournament in seventh place with a final tally of 944, a score of 80-over par.

Tournament winner Pepperdine shot a 41-over par 905.

In individual play, Joe Ida led the Wildcats with a 15th-place finish.

His final-round total of 75 was one stroke ahead of Mitchell Gregson, who finished tied for 17th overall at 18-over par.

Robert Streb finished with a 27-over par 243.

Norris said the strong wind put pressure on the team to perform well in the final round.

"At the start of the day we were seven shots out of sixth and seven shots out of last," Norris said. "It was a tough course on a picture-perfect day, and I thought the guys handled the stronger and gustier wind pretty well."

All 12 teams in the tournament shot over 300 in the opening round, and the Wildcats found themselves near the middle of the pack with a 32-over par 320. At the end of day one, K-State trailed leader Pepperdine by 20 strokes.

K-State finished the first day in eighth place, with Ida and Gregson leading the way with scores of 7-over par 79.

Brian Larson, who made his first appearance in the K-State lineup, carded a 9-over 81 in the first round, as did Streb.

The gusty winds continued to create havoc in the second round, making a tough course even tougher.

"Everyone was able to chip in, but the scores were sure a shock to the system," Norris said. "This golf course is very tough, and one mistake hurt a lot."

"I thought our putting was a little better, but we need to work through the process."

"If we eliminate little mistakes, we can get to where we need to be."

Fritz: Wildcats must display confidence to win road games, move up in Big 12

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State volleyball coach Suzie Fritz has repeated the importance of playing well on the road all season long.

After falling at Oklahoma on Saturday, the Wildcats are looking to avoid another road loss to Missouri tonight at 6:30.

To get a road win, Fritz said the Wildcats must avoid the slow start that doomed them against the Sooners.

"We played extremely poorly for two of four games," Fritz said. "I felt like we came out very flat at the start of the match. I have no rhyme or reason why, but we played very flat for two games and (were) not even close to what they are capable of doing."

The Wildcats, who are 3-2 on the road in conference play, are still learning how to win away from home on a consistent basis, Fritz said.

"I know what it takes to be a good road team, and I know that we don't have it yet," Fritz said. "We've got to play with more confidence and more focus. It's taken us too long to get our bearings."

The Wildcats will get a chance to prove they can win away from Ahearn Field House in the coming weeks, with matches coming up at Texas and Baylor.

"We have some significant road matches that will make the difference," Fritz said. "The difference between being third and seventh in league is small. It's one road win here or one road win there or taking care of the ones you're supposed to or winning the five-gamers."

Though the Wildcats have had some bright spots, Fritz said her team has lacked intensity on the road.

"We are just flatter, and it hasn't always been the case," Fritz said. "We played very well at Iowa State."

K-State has a 14-1 record against unranked opponents and beat an unranked Missouri team earlier in the season, but the Wildcats haven't beaten the Tigers in Columbia, Mo., since 2004.

The game will be broadcast on 1350 KMAN from the Hearn Center in Columbia.

Manhattan officials developing guidelines for ethics of city leaders

By Mayra Rivarola
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan city officials are developing a policy that will become a foundation for the public's trust.

Brian Williams, management intern, said an internal committee of city employees representing stakeholder groups is putting together the policy that will serve as a guideline for ethical behavior for city leaders.

"It is intended to apply to the kinds of activities that city employees and officials engage on a daily basis," Williams said.

The committee members will meet every two weeks to discuss a possible set of principles, said Jane Winslow, senior planner and member of the committee.

"We are in the process of assessing our principles and values," Winslow said. "A series of meetings have been scheduled, where we will be talking to different community groups about the policy."

During the presentations, also known as focus-group discussions, the committee members will ask for each group's input on the policy in identifying the city's core values, Winslow said.

The first draft of the policy will be presented to the city commissioners on Dec. 11, and the final draft should be ready for their approval on Jan. 22, Williams said.

If the city commission adopts the policy, it will apply to city staff, elected and appointed officials and members of the city's boards and committees, Williams said.

City Commissioner Bruce Snead said this is something the administration has wanted to apply for a while, following a growing trend in city governments.

"It will be useful for the commission to have an acknowledged set of values and a code of behavior developed that reflects the organization," Snead said.

City officials decided to develop the ethics policy following a presentation on ethics and policy development process on Sept. 25 by Martha Perego, director of the International City/County Management Association's Center for Ethics and Advocacy, according to information from the city's Web site, www.ci.manhattan.ks.us.

"We realized it's important for us to have guidelines for actions that we can apply as we support the city's mission," Winslow said. "Ethical behavior is a foundation to maintain public trust, which is critical for the success of any public organization."

Bluetongue outbreak in Europe unlikely to affect deer, livestock populations in United States

By Jelani Yancey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A recent outbreak of bluetongue viral infections in Europe will not affect U.S. cattle, local veterinarians and virologists say.

Bluetongue is a circulatory disease that invokes discoloration and swelling of affected tissues. Caused by the bluetongue virus, it affects deer and livestock like sheep, cows and goats, said Dr. Richard Lewis of the Westside Veterinary Clinic.

Human beings are immune to the virus, he said.

In the infected animal, the virus disrupts blood-vessel tissue, causing blood vessels to actually decompose, said Dr. Gary Anderson, professor of clinical sciences and director of the Veterinary Diagnostic Laboratory at K-State.

Without a lining to deliver blood to tissue, blood clots instead of flowing. The animal's flesh, which is normally pink or red, turns blue or ashen grey, Anderson said.

"When it happens to key organs, like the lungs and the heart, the system will shut down, he said. "That's what kills the animal."

Even before Europe's recent outbreak, bluetongue existed in the United States. It shows up in animals in the Southern states, Lewis said.

The biting midge, a small insect related to flies, passes the virus from one animal to another.

"It's a crazy little biting insect," Anderson said. "We call it the insect vector."

When the midge — or Culicoides imicola — sucks the blood of an infected animal, the virus replicates inside the insect. The next time the midge bites something, like a cow or sheep, the virus is passed on, Lewis said.

The midge is most active from mid-summer to early fall, Anderson said. Midges reproduce and lay eggs right after the biting season. Though the mature adults die out once cold weather rolls in, their eggs can survive winters in the Southern United States, which are mild compared to Northern states, Anderson said.

In the spring, the eggs develop into larvae, which mature by summer; their maturation sets off another biting season. "It is pretty rare in Kansas," Lewis said. "When you get more insects, you get more of it. A few years ago it was found in the deer population here."

Outbreaks of bluetongue occurred throughout Western Europe in July and August. In September, Britain recorded its first-ever case of bluetongue, according to BBC News.

Nations have instituted protocols regarding the transfer of animals and reproductive materials. Such materials must be tested and proven to be free of bluetongue before they are exported, Anderson said.

"We have considerable confidence that we will not contract whatever they had in Europe," he said.

The virus affects some animals more acutely than others. Deer and sheep suffer the most severe symptoms, Anderson said.

"In cattle, very seldom is it fatal," Anderson said. "It is inherent in the genetics of the animals that they are resistant at certain levels."

Local veterinarians sometimes request the K-State veterinary laboratory to test animals and animal tissues. Typically, the lab receives blood samples, though the lab occasionally is asked to test other types of tissues as well, Anderson said.

"We might get a post-mortem animal or aborted fetus or other evidence that may indicate the presence of bluetongue," Anderson said.

Developing an effective vaccine is difficult because there are so many variations in the virus, Anderson said.

"There's no real treatment, and there's very little you can do to prevent it," he said.

LETTER FROM THE VICE PRESIDENT

Garage funded by parking services revenue, not tuition

Anyone who has been around the K-State Student Union this semester knows there's substantial construction going on. What is currently a large hole in the ground is scheduled to be a state-of-the-art parking garage by December of 2008.

LYDIA PEELE

This idea did not come into fruition over night. People have had problems with parking for many years, and in the past few years, many people have put a lot of time into planning what would quickly solve many of those issues.

The first fact to make known is that this parking garage is not being funded by tuition dollars. It is — and will continue to be — paid for directly by customers of parking services through revenue generated by the sale of permits, tickets and other forms of revenue.

The parking facility will be four levels, with the first being underground. The garage will hold more than 1,300 spots, and the decision for how those spots will be allocated has yet to be determined by the parking council. That council consists of 11 faculty members, several students and myself. Several different proposals have been discussed at our general meetings, as well as at our garage sub-committee meetings.

What is important to note is that the committee is making every effort to be equitable in its decision-making. Being a strong representative for students is my first priority, and I feel confident that all perspectives will be taken into account in this process.

A picture of the garage and other information can be found at www.ksu.edu/parking.

Annual 'Rocky Horror' showing has large fan following on campus

The annual campus showing of the "Rocky Horror Picture Show" is this Friday, and the event, which attracts an assortment of people dressed in costumes, has been a tradition at K-State for more than 30 years.

The following is an article written by Sherri Hager from the Dec. 10, 1985, Collegian when the film celebrated its 10-year-anniversary here at K-State.

10 YEARS OF FRANK-N-FURTER AND ROCK 'N' ROLL

By Sherri Hager
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's a show that many can't see just once. It's the "queen" of the midnight movies — "The Rocky Horror Picture Show."

Even though it's celebrating its 10th anniversary this year, "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" is still encouraging audience participation.

The movie began as the play "They Came From Denton High" in June 1973. It opened in a 63-seat room above London's Royal Court Theatre and later moved to a 400-seat theater where it played for seven years.

After the play ran for almost 10 months, an American producer and director for Twentieth Century Fox — Lou Alder — saw it and quickly bought the movie rights.

"Rocky" was released in September 1975 to an indifferent audience. Eventually, though, it found its audience in the midnight hour. The movie is shown to audiences of fewer than 500 people so the dialogue will be noticed and provoke more interest. "Rocky," which cost $900,000 to make, has now grossed more than $60 million.

The original play, lyrics and music were written by Richard O'Brien who also cowrote the screenplay with Jim Sharman. O'Brien also played Riff-Raff in the play and film.

"Rocky" has become the longest continuously running film in America and has spawned fan clubs, merchandise conventions, four records and at least as many books.

It is a spoof of horror movies combined with a rock-'n'-roll score, a chorus line of bizarre "Transylvanians," and a man who is both a mad doctor and a transvestite.

The movie tells the story of Brad and Janet who set out to visit their former high school teacher, Dr. Scott. Their journey takes a strange turn when their car has a blowout and they begin to search for a telephone.

Yet it's not the film that draws "Rocky" fans to the theaters weekend after weekend. It is the characters and audience who follow the movie wherever it shows.

Among the characters are Dr. Frank-N-Furter, a "sweet transvestite from the planet Transsexual from the galaxy of Transylvania"; Riff-Raff, his hunchback servant; Rocky Horror, Frank-N-Furter's created man; the heroine Janet and hero Brad.

Each person in the audience finds a character they can enjoy and sometimes perform.

Dressed to the "T," fans take over some 250 theaters across the country every weekend to participate in what has been termed "one of the most dazzling, dizzy grade-B science-fiction films ever made."

For true "Rocky" fans, seeing the film one time might not be enough. They arrive week after week in make-up and costumes and loaded with props like rice, toast, toilet paper, newspapers and Bic lighters. The first three items are thrown at the screen at various times during the movie.

Students dressed in costumes like the "Rocky Horror Picture Show" characters as part of a K-State tradition that has lasted more than 30 years. The picture of the students celebrating the movie is from an Oct. 31, 1994, Collegian.

Not only are there those who participate from the audience, but there are also those who actually act out the movie in front of the audience. One of these "actors" is Larry Waggle, senior in anthropology, who performs as the character Rocky.

Waggle, who has seen the movie 160 times, was a member of the acting group Decadence, which would perform during showings of the movie. Decadence formed in the summer of 1982 with the characters Rocky, Columbia, Frank-N-Furter, Magenta and Riff-Raff.

Decadence has performed at several theaters, including the Grand in Topeka, the Bijou in Kansas City, Mo., and the Varsity in Manhattan.

"The movie is so different from anything you are used to seeing," Waggle said. "It's just a good time ... to go and yell and scream; no one really cares what you say."

People in the audience can choose their favorite characters and portray them. First, people wear the costumes and eventually they want to perform too, Waggle said.

"Rocky" fans might have a difficult time seeing the movie in Manhattan in the future because the Varsity Theater, which has shown the "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" in the past, has quit showing the movie.

"The attendance was really dropping, and it wasn't worth the money," said Doug Eckart, assistant manager of the Varsity. "(Audience participation) causes damage to the theater."

The transformation of "Rocky" to an audience participatory event began in New York at the Waverly Theater, where it opened on April Fool's Day in 1976.

A school teacher, Louis Farese, is credited with starting the alternative dialogue that has now become part of the text.

The audience shouts one-liners between the dialogue of the characters and during the songs.

When there is a performance group like Decadence in the theater, those people who are attending the show for the first time are likely to be sought out.

"We call them virgins, because they've never seen the show before," Waggle said.

Once the audience begins to enter the theater, Decadence members will go on what they call a "virgin hunt."

"We look for people and ask them if they have ever seen 'The Rocky Horror Picture Show,' and if they say no, we will circle them and explain what the show is about," Waggle said. "It's a great way for us to get people to come back."

And come back they do. Many have seen "Rocky" hundreds of times; others just a few. But whatever the reason, "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" definitely has a large and loyal following.

was convicted for being in possession of marijuana in December 2004.

"We were smoking in my friend's vehicle and got pulled over," he said. "The cop smelled drugs, and so he called for backup and started searching until he found a roach in the ashtray."

Though his financial aid was not affected, the alumnus said the police threatened him and said he ruined his future and told him, "when Sallie Mae hears about this, your financial aid is gone."

The alumnus said he could have contested his conviction because the drugs were in his friend's vehicle, but he was too worried about losing his financial aid to fight the case, so he pled no contest and got a diversion.

"My grades went down while I had to deal with the court case and lawyers and everything," he said. "I was so worried about losing my aid that I couldn't really concentrate in my classes, so I just gave up on the case."

The alumnus said he is against the penalty because college is a time for experimentation, and he said if students' lifestyles do not interfere with their grades, it should not have an effect on financial aid.

"The war on drugs has went on long enough," he said. "It has failed miserably. Our jails are overflowing from people committing victimless crimes. And when someone has the guts to take the path less traveled, they try to stop that person from getting educated."

Angell said now is the most important time to be campaigning against the penalty since the reauthorization could happen soon.

He said the organization encourages students to send letters to Congress or start campus chapters.

"Since this policy is targeting students and young people, it is up to our generation to fight back," Angell said. "If we don't speak up to Congress that this is a bad idea, then it will remain on the law books."

Thompson said he already has spent six months at Kabul, and he planned to go back to the university today until the winter holiday season. He said he plans to spend several periods during the next three years at the university.

While past benefactors have provided items like generators and computers to the university, Thompson said Kabul faculty and staff members were not shown how to use the items.

"We've come there to make a difference and make a change," Thompson said about K-State.

Donnelly also plans to travel to Kabul again. While good and bad situations exist in the reconstruction of the English department, Donnelly said "the challenges are great."

"This is really the future of Afghanistan," Donnelly said as an image of young Afghan children projected on the screen. "These kids need to go to college, and they need a good education. These are reasons why we go, and we can't forget the human side to what we do."

Military helps fight fires in SoCal while residents are evacuated

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

(CNN) — Dozens of Defense Department personnel are actively engaged in fighting the wildfires raging in Southern California, Pentagon officials said Tuesday, and thousands more National Guard and active-duty military personnel are available to help.

The Rice fire, east of Camp Pendleton, caused the evacuation of the Fallbrook community.

Paul McHale, assistant secretary of defense for homeland defense, said that 12 Defense Department fire-fighting teams, with 12 engines, are already working the blazes and more than 17,000 National Guardsmen are potentially available if needed.

In addition, he said, 550 Marines from Camp Pendleton are preparing to deploy to the fire area.

"All of the aid that we provide is the result of a request ... from the state," McHale said. "However, we have been very proactive in independently preparing those capabilities for the possibility of such requests, and we have reached out early to state officials."

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has already called up 1,500 National Guard troops, including more than 200 taken from border duty to help with supplies and security at San Diego's Qualcomm Stadium and DelMar Fairgrounds and Racetrack, where thousands of evacuated residents are taking shelter.

Schwarzenegger also requested and received from the federal government six "modular airborne fire fighting systems" units -- which are C-130s that drop water and fire suppressant on the blazes.

The Pentagon provided 11 helicopters equipped with water buckets to fight the fires, McHale said. Aerial attacks on the fires, however, have been minimal because of high Santa Ana winds with gusts approaching 70 mph.

In an effort to make room for more civilians who have had to evacuate their homes, sailors stationed in Southern California are abandoning their barracks.

"Orders have been given to all sailors ashore in barracks to move to shipboard billeting to provide room for evacuees," said a Tuesday statement released by the U.S. military.

Only essential personnel are requested to report to duty at Naval Base San Diego, Naval Amphibious Base in Coronado, and Naval Air Station in El Centro.

Those bases have also set up cots and tents for evacuees.

Also, the Navy has offered an Aegis cruiser, a guided missile destroyer, and two fast frigates to support evacuation efforts.

Meanwhile, the Pentagon designated March Air Reserve Base as the primary staging area for medical and relief supplies coordinated by the Federal Emergency Management Agency, McHale said.

And some 100 California National Guard medical personnel are helping alleviate "critical staffing shortfalls" at the San Diego Veterans Center, whose hospital staff are under voluntary and mandatory evacuation orders.

GOLF | Facility uses laser, video technology to improve swings

from the hitting bays by Burton, men's golfer Kyle Yonke and women's golfers Kali Quick and Michelle Regan.

Burton designed the facility so it could be accommodate the V-1 Video Golf System, which allows players to record their swings, analyze the flaws, and even compare their swings to those of pros like Tiger Woods.

"You could record yourself when you are swinging really well," Haney said. "When you come back after winter break and you're trying to get your game back. You can compare your swing to when you were swinging really good and hopefully get back to form."

Another feature of the facility is an indoor putting surface that uses lasers to analyze a golfer's putting stroke.

The facility also features three hitting bays that allow golfers to hit balls from the facility onto the outdoor driving range in even the worst conditions.

"It has three garage doors that we can open, and players can hit balls out on to the driving range," Knight said. "On a day that maybe it is really cold, it's a heated facility, so again, you are able to see your ball flight."

With funding continuing for the project, Haney said he and the coaches will continue to look for technologies that can help the golfers improve.

"Golf is a technology sport, and there will be many things down the road that we may need to take a look at to enhance a player's performance," Haney said.

INSTRUMENTAL FACE-OFF

6-string offers altered tones with smooth transitions

There is a saying that a dog is a man's best friend, which might be true for the layman. For the music man, however, it is the guitar. Peering backward into history, you'll find all great songwriters acclaimed and held dear by this generation and previous ones had two staple possessions throughout their careers — a suitcase and a guitar.

The guitar always was a traveling instrument and was well suited for it, and the traveler was always well suited for the guitar. A musician leads the life of a vagabond, and when the musician encounters hard times, the guitar is there, clasped inside its hard-shell case. As a result, we have the blues, then jazz. Ever since, American music has spread like a wildfire of artistic expression, never ceasing to permeate every aspect of society.

In its incredible deviations from its roots, almost every genre returns to its core — the guitar. The status the guitar holds in modern music was not an arbitrary decision, nor was it intentional. Rather, the guitar found its way onto front porches and into music halls by mere practicality.

The instrument was durable, easy to maintain, relatively inexpensive and easy to learn. With a couple days' wages, purchase, and the commitment of three simple chords to memory, anyone can play along with the variety of recorded songs. This ease and affordability returned music to the hardworking, lower class Americans. After all, that is where it belongs.

There are three distinct groups into which instruments all fit. These three groups consist of percussion, woodwinds and strings — the greatest of these being strings.

Percussion has proven to be a valuable tool in music — not, however, an independent one. From rhythm and blues to drum and bugle, percussion always seems to be found riding the coattails of its much more dominant and prominent counterpart — the melody. Though valuable and necessary to the experience, percussion is the Art Garfunkel of instruments, rarely finding success on its own.

Woodwind and brass instruments, though capable of melody, have one fatal flaw. The "wind" required to put inside the "wood" must come from the same place a songwriter should be singing. With these instruments, it's either music or lyrics, not both. In addition, woodwinds have no chordal quality, meaning they only can produce a single tone at one time rather than a chord, or group of tones. For this reason, woodwinds often are found in popular music accenting the melody but rarely as the backbone of a song.

The third and superior group, string instruments, incorporate anything creating their sound by the vibration of strings. Examples include the banjo, violin, guitar and bass. The selling point on this group is its versatility. The ability to construct chords was integral to jazz. Suddenly minor, seventh, diminished and augmented chords could supply the tension and release jazz is known for. Conversely, string instruments had the same abilities as other instruments in their ability to sustain the melody line, solo and improvise. Further increasing their flexibility, many string instruments can alter tones by bending and sliding.

The duality of string instruments to accommodate chord progressions and blend into the musical landscape, to take the lead and hold the melody, and to seamlessly transition between the two gives them an immense advantage over rival instruments.

The piano, by far the most permanent instrument in music history, always has had a distinct place in music. However, during the development of modern music, piano became less dominant because it was big, bulky, expensive and difficult to move. Until the recent development of digital keyboards, these factors limited its involvement in contemporary music. For this reason, the piano has taken a backseat to the guitar.

The guitar and piano were both standard pieces in blues and early jazz. Struggling, the guitar could barely compete with the volume of percussion and brass and would have resumed its humble role of simple accompaniment if it was not for innovation of the electric guitar.

According to the Wichita Beacon (now called the Wichita Eagle), the first documented use of the electric guitar was in Wichita, Kan., by band leader George Brewer in October 1932. It quickly gained popularity in the hands of Charlie Christian, Chuck Berry and other musicians. Now that the guitar could be heard, it would be heard.

No matter the context, the guitar has defined music and music has defined the guitar. Just as Elvis Presley, The Beatles, Johnny Cash and Bob Dylan learned, when there is a story to be told, the guitar is the best accessory you can have. We can only speculate on what instrument will prevail as artists continue to explore the boundaries of music, but if we're placing bets, my money's on the good ole' six-string.

Percussion provides band with steady beats, sound variety

Percussion instruments are the best type of instruments you can play. End of story.

Not only are the drums the undeniable backbone for most popular music, but percussion instruments have been around since almost the dawn of time, are the most dominant instrument, and have permeated more forms of music than almost any other instrument.

For thousands of years, drums have been used by the tribes of many nations to communicate with their gods, send messages and perform necessary ceremonial rituals.

What were the drums in American Indian ceremonies used for? Keeping the beat so the dancers could dance. Without the drums in those rituals, no one would have been able to keep a beat — and I would like to see the tribe keep the beat with a trumpet or piano. I don't think it would have been as effective.

In Africa, before modern technology allowed for communication via phone or Internet, tribes used drums and drum circles to send messages to neighboring groups. If an urgent message needed to be sent, like the warning of a war party approaching, people would get on the drums and beat out messages. If the only item the tribe had was a flute carved out of a tree branch, there would be no way to relay the message.

The drums also have become an integral part of commercial music.

If you take any band in the world today and remove its drummer, what would happen? Chaos would ensue. The guitars would not know when to start, the bass would be off and the lead singer would have no chance at making sense. The drums are simply the most integral part of the band.

I also would ask for a genre of music that does not have some sort of percussion in it. I will allow for the inclusion for electric drum machines used in some genres, because they serve the same purpose though they are very different.

Percussion instruments are the most dominant of the instruments. After their introduction into jazz music, which allowed for the rapid growth of the genre, the other instruments did not know what to do.

While not as overriding as the drums, the trumpets were fine to add one or two more brass instruments into the fold. This allowed for experimentation and the addition of more horns as staples in the genre.

The guitar is a different story. Rather than seeing the possibility for growth and development of the instrument, someone got the great idea to just make it louder. That sounds like the easy way out.

On drums, what do you have to do to make a louder sound? Beat harder. Usually when you beat a drum very hard, the sound is not as pleasing to the ear and can be distorted. More technique is required, but that comes later. It is not as simple as beating harder — you sort of have to know how to do it.

What do you need to sound better on a guitar? A well-placed turn of the volume knob does the trick. However, you can't just turn the dial and call it good. You have to get someone else to make sure the corresponding levels are not affected, and that — my friends — is a lot of work.

Orchestras have the right idea when it comes to percussion. Less is more.

Most times, there is not a lot of percussion represented in orchestras. Is it because the percussion does not matter? No. It's because if you put a bunch of timpani players at the back, you couldn't hear the soft and gentle sounds of the strings, and that would upset them. According to bbc.co.uk, the strings together outnumber almost all other types of instruments onstage. The average percussion section in an orchestra consists of three to five people, a far cry from the dozens of woodwinds and strings.

The most popular form of percussion, easily the drum kit, also takes more practice to master than other popular instruments. When learning the guitar, for example, you only have to make two hands do different things. The same goes for the flute, oboe, trumpet, baritone and many other instruments.

When it comes to the drum kit, two hands just aren't enough. To achieve the full and varied sound that comes from hitting four things at once, you have to move both arms and legs. It is much harder to master moving all four limbs at once than learning to master only two. Try it, and you will see.

Overall, percussion's dominance of the music world should be obvious. It has been around a lot longer than most other instruments, is more essential than most implements in a band and is harder to master. I rest my case.

Guitar vs.
Drums

This is the fourth of many battle pages that will run this semester on The Edge page. While the main point is satirical, the facts are true, and the writers are passionate about their respective topics. Today's battle debates which musical instrument is a band's most essential music-making tool. If you have a suggestion for a battle topic, e-mail The Edge editor Eric Davis at edge@pub.ksu.edu.

CARBON DIOXIDE EMISSIONS FROM KANSAS POWER PLANTS ARE ALREADY 77% ABOVE
THE NATIONAL AVERAGE PER PERSON. THE EXISTING COAL-FIRED POWER PLANT AT HOLCOMB RANKS #11 IN THE NATION FOR MERCURY EMISSIONS. IMAGINE WHAT A PLANT FIVE TIMES ITS CURRENT SIZE WOULD DO TO PUBLIC HEALTH.

HOLDING THE LINE ON COAL PLANTS

KANSAS STANDS UP AGAINST COAL POLLUTION

SPARE THE AIR, PROTECT PUBLIC HEALTH

Steve Simpson, MD

Associate Professor of Pulmonology
University of Kansas
Medical Center

The additional 1400-megawatt, coal-fired units proposed for Holcomb would emit ten million more tons of carbon dioxide annually and take a serious additional toll on public health. The irony is, Kansans don't need that much extra electricity. Almost all (85%) of the power generated would be sold out of state. We'd just keep 100% of the pollution.

The perception has been that "coal is cheaper" for generating electricity. But Kansas is realizing that fuel cost is a fraction of the expense they will bear if this $3.5 billion expansion were built. Coal plant construction overruns and costly future carbon taxes have led to the rejection or withdrawal of 22 proposed coal power plants in 16 states since last year. Kansas should be the 17th state.

Of course, "cheaper" also doesn't cover the harm coal emissions do to public health and consequent medical costs - and that harm begins before birth, given the effect of pollution on pregnant women as well as children, the elderly and many adults.

Coal pollutants that affect health and life expectancy (and require costly medical care) include carbon dioxide, mercury and hazardous fine particles.

Diseases: Children exposed to coal plant emissions are at higher risk for a host of respiratory problems, including allergies, asthma and other respiratory diseases - even affecting lung development. Emissions also cause heart disease, stroke, cancer, early deaths and lifetimes of compromised health for thousands of Kansans. This is no bargain.

Our state's medical community is joining forces with other Kansans who are committed to rejection of the proposed Holcomb power plant. We can't afford the high price of pumping more coal pollution into Kansas skies. The time to stand up is now.
